SELECT FABLES OF ESOP
AND OTHER FABULISTS.
IN THREE BOOKS.

—Is not the earth
With various living creatures, and the air
Replenished, and all these at thy command
To come and play before thee? Knowest thou not Their language and their ways? They also know,
And reason not contemptibly: with these Find pastime.  Paradise Lost, B. 8. l. 370.

BIRMINGHAM, Printed by JOHN BASKERVILLE, for
R. and J. DODSLEY in Pall-mall. 1764.
THE PREFACE.

The fables of Esop have always been esteemed the best lessons for youth, as being well adapted to convey the most useful maxims, in a very agreeable manner. Accordingly, many writers both in verse and prose, have endeavoured to clothe them in an English dress. It would ill become the Author of this work to animadvert upon their labours: but he thinks it may be said with truth, and he also hopes with modesty, that nothing of this kind, which has been published in prose, can justly discourage him from the present undertaking.

In forming this collection, he has endeavoured to distinguish, by two separate books, the respective compositions of the the earlier and later mythologists; and he trusts it will not be found that he has often been mistaken in this distribution, though an error of that kind might perhaps appear of no great importance. His principal aim was to select such Fables as would make the strongest and most useful impressions on the minds of youth; and then to offer them in such unaffected language, as might have some tendency to improve their style. If in this he should be allowed to have at all succeeded; the work, it is presumed, will not be unserviceable to young readers, nor wholly un-entertaining to persons of maturer judgment.

To these he has ventured to add a third Book consisting entirely of original Fables; and he offers it to the public with all the diffidence which ought to accompany every modern production, when it appears pears in conjunction with writings of established reputation. Indeed, whatever hopes he has, that the present work may be favourably received, arise chiefly from the consideration, that he has been assisted in it by gentlemen of the most distinguished abilities; and that several, both of the old and new Fables, are not written by himself, but by authors, with whom it is an honour to be connected; and who having condescended to favour him with their assistance, have given him an opportunity of making some attonement for his own defects.
PREFACE.

The life of Esop prefixed to this collection, is taken from Mons. de Meziriac, a very learned and ingenious Frenchman; who being disgust'd with the gross forgeries of that lying monk Planudes, published in 1632, the best account he could collect from ancient writers.
writers of good authority. But this little book, soon after became so extremely scarce, that Monf. Bayle, in the first edition of his dictionary, laments he never could get a sight of it; Dr. Bentley in his dissertation on Esop's Fables makes much the same complaint; nor does it appear that Sir Roger Lestrange or Dr. Croxton, ever so much as heard of Meziriac's name. The work indeed in the original has continued equally scarce to this day; but an English translation of it falling into the writer's hands, he hath endeavoured in some measure to correct the language; adding notes from several authors, particularly from Boyle's and Bentley's controversy on the subject; and he is persuaded that the judicious reader will not condemn him for adopting it, instead of the fictitious and absurd relation of Planudes.
THE LIFE of ESOP,
COLLECTED FROM ANCIENT WRITERS.

By Mons. DE MEZIRIAC.
Translated into ENGLISH.
WITH NOTES.
THE LIFE OF ESOP

COLLECTED FROM ANCIENT WRITERS

BY MONT DE MEXIRIO

Translated into English

WITH NOTES
THE LIFE of ESOP.

CHAP. I.

Of the place of his birth.

IT happened to Homer, the prince of Grecian poets, that the place of his nativity was never certainly known; and it would be as difficult to ascertain the country which gave birth to Esop, so much have ancient authors differed also upon this subject. Some have thought him a Lydian, born in the city of Sardis, the capital of that kingdom; others have believed he drew his origin from the island of Samos. Some have maintained that he was a Thracian, of the city of Mesembria: but authors are now, for the most part, agreed, that he was a native of Phrygia, either of Amorium, or Cotiaeum, both towns in the same province. However, as it may be allowable to conjecture on a point so dubious, I imagine they who have thought him a Lydian, or a Samian, mian, have grounded their opinion on the probability of his being born in one of these places where he spent the greatest part of his life; and 'tis certain, that during his slavery, his common habitation was in the island of 7 Samos; and after he was made free, he lived almost wholly in the court of Cæcillus king of Lydia. But though this opinion is not totally destitute of a plausible appearance, the probability of his being a 8 Phrygian, as it is founded on the common consent of many ancient writers, and supported by the most credible authority, is now generally received and established.

NOTES.

1 Maximus Tyrius, Dissert. XX. 2 Suidas. 3 The Scholia on Aristophanes. Heraclides in Gronov. Thes. Graec. Tom. VI. p. 2827. 4 Maximus Tyrius. Dissert. XXXIII. Lucian's True History, Book II. Stobaeus. Suidas. A. Gellius. Phaedrus. 5 Planudes. 6 Suidas. Fabricius. 7 Jadmon at least, his last Master, was of this island. Suidas says expressly, that Xanthus was a Lydian. Fabricius indeed calls him a Samian, but quotes no authority for it, nor can I find any. 8 Phrygia is a province of Asia Minor.
It may perhaps be acceptable to some readers, and not improper in this place, to add a passage from the learned Mr. Sale, in his notes to the Koran, concerning the Eastern fabulist Lokman, who has been imagined by some writers to be the same person with our Esop. The Arabian writers, says he, affirm that Lokman was the son of Bawvan, who was the son or grandson of a sister or aunt of Job; and that he lived several centuries, even to the time of David, with whom he was conversant in Palestine. According to the description they give of his person, he must have been deformed enough; for they say he was of a black complexion, (whence some call him an Ethiopian) with thick lips, and splay feet: but in return, he received from God, wisdom and eloquence, in a great degree; which, some pretend, were given him in a vision, on his making choice of wisdom preferable to the gift of prophecy, either of which were offered him. The generality of the Mohammedans therefore hold him to have been no prophet, but only a wise man. As to his condition, they say he was a slave, but obtaining his liberty on the following occasion. His Master having one day given him a bitter melon to eat, he paid him such exact obedience as to eat it all; at which his master being surprized, asked him, How he could eat so bitter a fruit? To which he replied, It was no wonder, that he should for once accept a bitter fruit from the same hand from which he had received so many favours. The commentators mention several quick re-partees
partees of Lokman, which, together with the circumstances above mentioned, agree so well with what Maximus Planudes had written of Esop, that from thence, and from the fables attributed to Lokman by the Orientals, the last has been generally thought to be no other than the Esop of the Greeks. However that be, (for I think the matter will bear a dispute) I am of opinion that Planudes borrowed great part of his life of Esop, from the tradition he met with in the East concerning Lokman, concluding them to have been the same person, because they were both slaves, and supposed to be the writers of those fables which go under their respective names, and bear a great resemblance to one another; for it has long been observed by learned men, that the greater part of that monk's performance is an absurd romance, and supported by no evidence of ancient writers.

Sale's Koran. p. 335.

A collection of Lokman's fables may be found in Erpenius's Arabic Grammar, between thirty and forty in number, printed in Arabic, with a Latin translation. They very much resemble the fables of Esop, and have most of them been inserted in our collections: particularly, the Stag drinking—The old Man and Death—The Hare and the Tortoise—The Sun and the Wind—with many others, all of which are in Erpenius's collection, under the name of Lokman. The fables of Pil-pay, the other Eastern, are of quite a different cast, long, tedious, and frequently interwoven one with another. I have inserted in this collection, only one fable from Pilpay, The Falcon and the Hen, in the second book.
Of his person, talents, and disposition.

'TIS allowed by all, that Esop was a slave from his youth, and that in this condition, he served several masters: but I am ignorant where Planudes has authority for asserting that he was the most deformed of all men living, exactly resembling Homer's Thersites; I find no ancient author who thus describes him. What Planudes adds, that the word Esop signifies the same with AEthiop, and was given him on account of the blackness of his visage, may be very justly contradicted: for though some grammarians are of opinion, that from the verb aetho, which signifies to scorch, and from the noun oops, which signifies visage, the word AEthiop may be formed; yet we learn from Eustathius, that aetho (in the future aeso) signifies to shine, as well as to burn; and that oops with an o long signifies the eye: so that the name Esop signifies a man with sparkling eyes. Neither do I give credit credit to the same author, when he says, that Esop had such an impediment in his tongue, that he could scarcely utter articulate sounds;
as he seems to have attributed this imperfection to him, only to have some ground for the fabulous account which he afterwards gives, of Fortune's appearing to him in a dream, and bestowing on him the gift of speech. Altogether as void of probability is the story which Apollonius tells in 2 Phi-lostratus; that Mercury, having distributed to other persons the knowledge of all the sciences, had nothing left for Esop but the art of making fables, with which he endowed him. But a principal reason which prevents me from assenting to what Planudes advances, is, that it cannot be supported by authority from any 3 ancient author: on the contrary, 'tis asserted in a Greek fragment of his life, found in the works of Aph-thonius, that Esop had an excellent disposition, and universal talents; in particular,
a great inclination and aptitude for music;
which is not very consistent with his having a bad voice, and being dumb.

NOTES.
to his memory: but had he been such a monster as Planudes has made of him, a statue had been no better, than a monument of his ugliness; it had been kinder to his memory to let that alone. The Greeks have several proverbs about persons deformed; our Esop, if so very ugly, had been in the first rank of them, especially when his statue stood there, to put every body in mind of it. He was a great favourite of Cræsus king of Lydia; who employed him as his ambassador to Corinth and Delphi: but would such a monster as Planudes has set out, be a fit companion for a prince? or a proper ambassador? I wish I could do that justice to the memory of Esop, as to oblige the painters to change their pencil; for ’tis certain he was no deformed person, and ’tis probable he was very handsome.

Bentley on Esop’s Fables.

In answer to all this, Mr. Boyle cites a passage from Eustathius, an author who wrote two hundred years before Planudes was born, which he thinks is evidently built on a supposition that Esop was ugly, and implies that that opinion was common in Eustathius’s time. He further tells us, that Lucian, in his True History, says, they used Esop in the Fortunate Islands for a buffoon, or jester, one that made them sport: meaning, I suppose, that he did it as well by his person and outside, as by his ingenious and divertive fables; and, indeed, rather by the first than the latter, as his fables of themselves, though though they entertain and please us extremely, do not give us that sort of pleasure that causes laughter; but nothing is so divertive, or raises laughter so much as deformity, especially when wit goes along with it. We may observe, that when Homer has a mind to excite this light passion in his serious poem, he does it by the means of an ugly man, and an ugly god, Thersites and Vulcan.—But Dr. Bentley's conduct with regard to Esop, is very odd. He is extremely concerned to have him thought handsome, at the time that he is endeavouring all he can to prove him no author. He hopes by his civilitie to his person, to atone for the injuries which he does him in his writings: which is just such a compliment to Esop's memory, as it would be to Sir William Davenant's, should a man, in defiance of common fame, pretend to make out, that he had always a good nose on his face; but however, he did not write Gondibert.

Boyle against Bentley.

I shall here leave the reader to consider the opinion of these two gentlemen, and to take that which seemeth to him the most probable: only observing, that Mr. Alford, though a writer at that time in favour of Boyle on the general subject of Esop's Fables, yet, when he afterwards published a collection of those Fables, thought proper to make Esop in the frontispiece; a very handsome person.
Esop's first master, as may be gathered from the before mentioned Aphthonius, was Zemarchus, or Demarchus, surnamed Carefias, a native and inhabitant of Athens: and his passing some part of his youth in this famous city, the mother and nurse of science and polite learning, was of no small advantage to him. 'Tis probable also, that his master, perceiving in him a good understanding, agreeable manners, lively genius, and a general capacity; and finding also that he served him with much affection and fidelity; 'tis probable, I say, that he might take care to get him instructed. It was from Athens then, as from the fountain head, that he drew the purity of the Greek language. It was there too, that he acquired the knowledge of moral philosophy, which at that time was the fashionable study; there being but few persons who made profession of the speculative sciences, as may be concluded by the seven sages of Greece, the most celebrated men of that age, amongst whom Thales, the Milesian, alone had the curiosity to inquire into the secrets of natural philosophy, and into the subtilties of mathematical learning: The rest were not reputed wise for any other reason, than their publishing certain grave and moral sentences, the truth of which they established, and rendered of some authority, by their prudent and virtuous lives. Esop, indeed, did not follow their method; he wisely considered, that the meanness of his birth, and his servile condition, would not permit him to speak with sufficient authority in the way of sentence and precept; he therefore composed fables, which by a narration pleasing and full of novelty, so charms the minds, even of the most ignorant, that through the pleasure which they receive from it, they taste imperceptibly the moral sense which lies concealed underneath.

I know very well that Esop was not the first inventor of those fables, in which the ufe of speech is given to animals. The honour of this invention, as a Quintilian alledges, is justly due to the poet Hesiod, who in the first book of his Works and Days, relates very prettily the fable of the hawk and the nightingale. Be this as it may—

Esop has advanced so far before every competitor, that all fables of this kind are called Esopic, because a great number of them are of his composing; and the choicest precepts of moral philosophy, are by his means, conveyed to us in this agreeable manner. And indeed, I very highly approve the opinion of Apollonius, who maintains that the fables of Esop are much more useful for the instruction of youth, than the fables of the poets: and his reasons for this assertion are very pertinent, as may be seen in Philostra-

tus. But that Esop composed all his fables during the time that he was a slave at Athens,

I will not however affirm: I only think it probable, that it was there he first became enamoured of morality, and laid the plan of teaching the most beautiful and useful maxims of philosophy, under the veil of fables:

fables: which nevertheless he might not publish till long afterwards, when he had obtained his freedom, had acquired the reputation of being one of the wisest and ablest men of Greece, and was arrived to great esteem, not only among the common people, but even with princes and kings.

NOTES.

1 Whatever honour may arise from being the inventor of this kind of fable, it seems neither to be due to Hesiod, nor to Esop; as Jotham's fable of the trees is certainly more ancient than either of them: and it is for that reason, placed at the head of this collection.

2 Book v. chap. 11.

3 The said fable is thus rendered by Cooke.

Whilst now my fable from the birds I bring,
To the great rulers of the earth I sing.
High in the clouds a mighty bird of prey
Bore a melodious nightingale away;
And to the captive, shivering in despair,
Thus, cruel, spoke the tyrant of the air,
Why mourns the wretch in my superor power?
Thy voice avails not in the ravish’d hour;
Vain are thy cries: at my despotic will,
Or I can set thee free: or I can kill.
Unwisely who provokes his abler foe,
Conquest still flies him, and he strives for woe.

Cook’s Hesiod, B. I.
CHAP. IV.

Of his different masters, and of his fellow servant, the famous courtesan, Rhodopis.

LET us now resume the thread of our narration. In process of time, Esop was sold to Xanthus, a native of the island of Samos; and after he had served him for a certain time, he was again disposed of to the philosopher Idmon or Jadmon, who was likewise of that country; and had at the same time for his slave, that Rhodopis, who was afterwards so famous as a courtesan. This woman was endowed with very extraordinary beauty, and happening to be carried into Egypt, Charaxus, the brother of Sappho, the poetess, fell so deeply in love with her, that he sold all he had, and reduced himself to extreme poverty, in order to redeem and set her at liberty. She afterwards rose to such eminence in her vocation, and amassed such heaps of wealth, that of the tythe of her gain, she caused great numbers of large spits of iron to be made, made, which she sent as an offering to the temple of Apollo at Delphi. And if we may credit certain authors, she amassed such immense treasure, as enabled her to build one of the celebrated 5 pyramids of Egypt. So much, by the way, of this famous courtezan, who was fellow servant with Esop while he lived with Jadmon; to shew how these two persons born, in a servile condition, arrived by very different methods to a more splendid fortune; the one by his merit and the beauties of his mind, the other by the infamous traffic of her personal charms.

For the rest, 'tis certain that it was Jadmon who gave Esop his liberty; whether as a reward for his faithful services, or that he was ashamed to keep longer in servitude a person whose superior qualities rendered him more worthy to command, may be difficult to determine: but the fact is to be proved, by the implied testimony of the scholiast of Aristophanes, on the comedy of the Birds, as well as by the authority of Herodotus and... and Plutarch; for it follows by necessary consequence from what they say, as I shall shew particularly when I come to speak of the death of Esop. Planudes therefore deserves no credit, when he affirms that Xanthus was the last master of Esop, and the person who gave him his liberty, Very little also must be believed of what he relates concerning Esop while he was in the service of Xanthus, as he makes him say and do so many impertinent and ridiculous things, that none can receive them for true, without imagining Esop an idle buffoon, rather than a serious Philosopher. And in fine, since nothing of this ridiculous stuff is to be found in ancient writers, I think one may with justice affirm, that they are no better than idle tales, and mere fooleries.

NOTES.

1 The Sholiast on Aristophanes, on which Meziriac builds his authority for this, does not say so.

2 Neither Herodotus, nor Plutarch, nor Suidas, call him a philosopher: it was a title unknown in the time of
Of his advancement to the court of Croesus king of Lydia, and of his meeting the seven sages there.

Whatever may be doubtful in the life of Esop, there is nothing more certain, than, that after recovering his liberty, he soon acquired a very great reputation amongst the Greeks, being held in almost equal estimation with any of the seven sages, who flourished at this time, that is, the 3 fifty-second olympiad. The fame of his wisdom reaching the ears of Croesus, that monarch sent for him to his court, admitted him to his friendship, and so obliged him by his favours, that he engaged himself in his service to the end of his days. His residence in the court of this mighty king, rendered him more polite than most of the other philosophers of his time; more complaisant to the humour of princes, and more reconciled to monarchical government, of which he gave evident proofs on divers occasions. For instance; when Croesus had prevailed prevailed with the seven sages to meet in his capital city of Sardis; after having shewn them the magnificence of his court, and his vast riches, he asked them, whom they thought the happiest man of all they had known: Some named one person, and some another? Solon, in particular, gave this praise to Tellus, an Athenian; and also to Cleobbis and Biton, Argians, concluding, that no one could be pronounced happy before his death. Esop, perceiving the king was not well satisfied with any of their answers, spoke in his turn, and said—For my part,
I am persuaded that Croesus hath as much pre-eminence in happiness over all other men, as the sea hath over all the rivers.
The king was so pleased with this judgment, that he eagerly pronounced that sentence, which has continued ever since a common proverb—The Phrygian has hit the mark!
When Solon, therefore, took leave of Cro-esus, who dismissed him very coolly; Esop being sorry that Solon had spoken to the king with so little complaisance, said to him, as he accompanied him part of the way, O Solon,
Solon, either we must not speak to kings, or we must say what pleases them. On the contrary, answered Solon, we must either not speak to kings at all, or we must give them good and useful advice. Another time, as Esop was travelling over Greece, either to satisfy his curiosity, or about the particular affairs of Croesus, it happened that he passed through Athens, just after Pisistratus had usurped the sovereign power, and abolished the popular state: seeing that the Athenians bore the yoke very impatiently, longing to recover their liberty, and to rid themselves of Pisistratus, though his government was easy and moderate, Esop related to them the fable of the frogs that intreated Jupiter to give them a king; exhorted them to submit cheerfully to so good a prince as Pisistratus, left in changing they should fall under the power of some mischievous and cruel tyrant.

NOTES.
NOTES.

1 Laertius, in the life of Chilon.

2 Suidas.

3 Tellus was a poor Athenian, but a man of great probity; who, upon account of having given his children a good education, and lost his own life in the field of battle, fighting for his country, had this noble testimony given to his happiness, by Solon.

Plutarch. Diog. Leartius.

4 Cleobis and Biton were sons to the priestess of Juno, who, when their mother wanted horses for her chariot, set their shoulders to it, and drew it to the temple, which was 48 furlongs. The old lady, being much affected with this instance of filial duty, prayed the goddess Juno to favour them with the greatest blessing that could be bestowed upon mankind: the next morning they were both found dead in the temple. Herod. B. I. Val. Max. B. V. And the story is mentioned also by Cicero in his Tusculan Questions, to shew, that death is to be looked upon rather as an advantage than an evil.

5 Phaedrus.
Some detached particulars of his life, and the improbability of Planudes's account of his travels into Egypt and Babylon.

There are not many other particulars found concerning Esop, in authors worthy of credit; except it be, that he once again met with the seven sages of Greece, in the court of Periander, king of Corinth. However, I dare not affirm whether it was here, or in some other place, that falling into discourse with Chilon, who had asked him, What God was doing? He answered, that he was humbling high things, and exalting low. Some also relate, that to shew how the life of man abounds with misery, and that one pleasure is accompanied with a thousand pains; Esop was wont to say, that Prometheus having taken earth to form a man, had tempered and moistened it, not with water, but with tears.

I reject as pure falsehood and invention, all that Planudes writes of Esop's travels into into Egypt and Babylon, because he intermixes stories altogether incredible; and adds to them certain circumstances, which are repugnant to the truth of history, or which wholly overturn the order of time. I shall content myself with alleging two signal falsities, on which he builds all the rest of his narration. He says, that the king who reigned in Babylon when Esop went thither, was called Lycerus. But who has ever read or heard of such a king? Let the catalogue of all the kings of Babylon, from Nabonassar to Alexander the Great, be examined, and you shall not find one amongst them whose name is at all like Lycerus. On the other hand, by the exact chronology it will appear, that in Esop’s time there could be no other king in Babylon, but Nebuchadnezer, and his father Nebopolassar; since Nebopolassar reigned one and twenty years, and Nebuchadnezer forty three, who died the same year with Esop, being the first of the fifty-fourth olympiad. Neither is it more possible to believe, that Esop went into Egypt in the time of king Nectanebus, as Planudes afferts; since this king did not begin to reign till two hundred years after the death of Esop: that is to say, in the hundred and fourth olympiad. And one need not be very learned in chronology, to be certain, that Esop lived partly under the reign of Apries, and partly under that of his Successor Amasis, king of Egypt.

NOTES.

1 Plutarch assures us, in Convivio Sapientum, that Cæsus sent Esop to Periander the tyrant of Corinth, as well as to the oracle at Delphi: but how does this agree with Laertius, who, in the life of Periander, tells us, that according to Sosicrates, Periander died many years before the reign of Cæsus?

2 Laertius, in the life of Chilon.

3 Themist. Orat. XXXII.
C H A P. VII.

Of his death.

WHAT Planudes relates about the death of Esop, comes nearer to the truth, than any thing which he has written concerning his life. However, it is still safer to rely on what ancient authors have said on the subject; and they record it thus. Esop, being sent by Croesus to the city of Delphi, with a large sum of gold, in order to offer magnificent sacrifices to Apollo, and to distribute to each citizen four minae of silver; it happened that differences arose between him and the townsmen, to such a degree, that he spoke of them in very provoking terms. Among other things, he reproached them with having hardly any arable land, and that were it not for the great concourse of strangers, and the frequent sacrifices that were offered in their temple, they would soon be reduced to die of hunger. Not satisfied with offending them in words, he proceeded to deeds: having performed formed the sacrifices in the manner that Croesus had ordered, he sent back the rest of the money to the city of Sardis, as judging the Delphians unworthy to partake of the king's liberality. This irritated them against him to such a degree, that they consulted how they might be revenged on him, and conspired by a notorious villany to take away his life. They hid amongst his baggage one of the 3 golden vessels consecrated to Apollo; and as Esop departed towards Phocis, they sent immediate messengers after him, who searching his baggage, found the vessel which they themselves had there deposited. On this, they presently drag him to prison, accuse him of sacrilege, and sentence him to be precipitated from the rock Hyampia, which was the punishment commonly inflicted on sacrilegious persons. As they were on the point of throwing him off, in order to deter them from so execrable an act, by the apprehension of divine justice, which suffers no wickedness to go unpunished, he told them the 4 fable of the eagle and the beetle. But the Delphians paying no no regard to his fable, pushed him down the precipice. It is recorded, however, that their land was rendered barren, and that they were afflicted with many strange dis-temperers, for several years afterwards. In this distress they consulted the oracle, and were answered, that all their miseries were owing to the unjust condemnation and death of Esop. On this, they caused it to be proclaimed by sound of trumpet, at all the public feasts and general meetings of the Greeks, that if there were any of the kindred of Esop, who would demand satisfaction for his death, he was desired to come and exact it of them, in what manner he pleased. But no one was found that pretended any right in this affair, till the third generation; when a Samian presented himself, named Jadmon, grandson of that Jadmon, who had been master to Esop in the island of Samos: and the Delphians having made him some satisfaction, were delivered from their calamities. 'Tis said, that after this time, they transferred the punishment of sacrilegious persons from the rock Hyam-pia to that of Nauplia. From hence it appears, as I hinted above, to be the opinion of Herodotus and Plutarch, that Jadmon was the last master of Esop, and he that set him free; because otherwise, neither he nor any of his descendents could have any interest in his death, nor pretend to any right of seeking reparation, or receiving satisfaction.

NOTES.

1 Scholiast on Aristophanes. Vseop. v. 1437.

2 On what occasion these differences arose, we are not expressly told: yet some circumstances lead one to imagine, that Esop's expectations were not quite satisfied with regard to the Delphians. From the great concourse of sensible men, who were dispatched from all parts of Greece to their city; he had probably been led to expect in them some superior degree of virtue or wisdom; but found them, upon a nearer acquaintance, to be not only lazy, but ignorant: his reproaching them for depending so much on the benefits arising from sacrifices, as to neglect the cultivation of their lands, seems an intimation of the first; and his comparing the curiosity that brought him thither, to that of people at the sea side, who seeing somewhat come floating towards them a great way off at sea, take it at first to be some mighty matter; but upon its driving nearer and nearer to the shore, find it at last to be only a heap of weeds and rubbish—is almost a confirmation of the latter. Indeed, what authority Sir Roger Lestrange had for making Esop relate this fable to the Delphians, he has not been so kind as to inform us.

4 The eagle and the beetle was one of the most noted fables of Esop: Aristophanes mentions it several times. The circumstances of it, as far as they may be collected from him, are as follows: “That the beetle flew up to heaven; and out of hatred to the eagle, rolled his eggs out of the nest, and so revenged himself of the injury which the eagle had done him.” In Pace, ι. 177. he says, “That Esop told this fable to the Delphians, when they had accused him of sacrilege. Vesp. ι. 1437. And when they were about to throw him down the rock,” says the Scholiast. The Scholiast upon these passages gives us these farther particulars: “It is related in the fables of Esop, that the eagle and the beetle were at enmity together, and they destroyed one another’s eggs: that the eagle having seized and eaten up the young ones of the beetle, and so given the first first provocation, the beetle got by stealth at the eagle's eggs, and rolled them out of the nest; following him even into the presence of Jupiter: the eagle making his complaint, Jupiter ordered him to make his nest in his lap: while Jupiter had the eggs in his lap, the beetle came flying about him; and Jupiter rising up unawares, to drive the beetle away from his head, threw down the eggs and broke them.” Suidas, plainly quoting the same fable, says also, “That he rose up to drive away the beetle flying about his head.” Aristophanes in another place uses the proverbial saying, “I will be your midwife, as the beetle was to the eagle.” Lysistrata, v. 695. Upon which the Scholiaist remarks, “That the beetles destroy the eagle's eggs by rolling them out of the nest;” and Suidas says, “That the proverb is used of those, who revenge themselves of such as have first used them ill, though they are much more powerful;” and adds likewise, “That the beetle is said to destroy the eagle's eggs,” as a thing that commonly happens.

It is plain from hence, that the fable of the eagle and beetle, as we have it now, differs very much from the original fable of Esop. There is no mention at all of the hare; the provocation given by the eagle, was his destroying the beetle's eggs, or young ones; and the beetle made Jupiter throw the eggs out of his lap, not by throwing a ball of dung into his lap, but by flying flying about his head. What is added in the present fable, of Jupiter's endeavouring to reconcile the two parties, but in vain; and then, to preserve the race of eagles, ordering them to lay their eggs in a season in which no beetles appear; is quite beside Esop's purpose, and the occasion of the fable. The moral, which he intended to express, and which the occasion required, is, agreeable to Suidas's interpretation of the proverb, that the weak often find means to revenge themselves of the powerful, who without provocation have injured them. The latter circumstance relating to the season in which the eagle breeds, is contrary to the observation of the Scholiaet on Aristophanes, and Suidas; and, I suppose, is not true in fact.

The genuine fable of Esop is certainly lost: and that which we have may probably have been invented by Planudes; it is in his collection, and stands the fourth in that edition of them, which was printed by Robert Stephens in 1546. That the reader may judge for himself, I will here insert a literal translation of it, given me by the same learned friend, who favoured me with the above observations.

The Eagle and the Beetle.

A Hare being pursued by an Eagle, betook himself for refuge to the nest of the Beetle, whom he intreated to to save him. The Beetle therefore interceded with the Eagle, begging of him not to kill the poor suppliant Hare; and conjuring him by the almighty Jupiter, not to slight and disregard his intercession, because he was so small an animal. But the Eagle in great wrath gave the Beetle a flap with his wing, and immediately seized the Hare, and devoured him. When the Eagle flew away, the Beetle flew after him, so far as to learn where his nest was; and then getting to it, rolled down his eggs out of it, and broke them. The Eagle grieved and enraged to think that anyone should attempt so audacious a thing, built his nest the next time in a higher place; but the Beetle got to it again, and served him just in the same manner. The Eagle greatly distressed, and not knowing what to do, flew up to Jupiter, (to whom he is accounted sacred) and placed her third brood of eggs as a deposite in the lap of the God, begging him to guard them. Upon this the Beetle, having made a ball of dung, flew up, and dropped it in Jupiter's lap; who rising on a sudden to shake it off, unawares threw down the eggs with it, which were thus again broken. Jupiter being informed by the Beetle, that he had done this to be revenged of the Eagle, who had not only behaved injuriously to him, (the Beetle) but even impiously towards the God himself, told the Eagle when he came to him, that the Beetle was the party aggrieved, and that he complained not without reason: but being unwilling that the race of Eagles should be diminished, diminished, he advised the Beetle to come to an accommodation with the Eagle. As the Beetle would not agree to this, he transferred the Eagle's breeding to another season, when there are no Beetles to be seen.
The LIFE of ESOP.

Absurdities in the forgoing Fable.

The Hare's flying to the Beetle for protection; or to the Beetle's nest for refuge:—utterly improbable.

The Beetle's rolling the Eagle's eggs out of the nest;—impossible.

The only moral of the fable is, that no protection, however powerful, shall exempt the oppressive and injurious from the vengeance of the sufferers, however weak. The circumstance added, that Jupiter transferred the Eagle's breeding to a season when there are no Beetles, destroys this moral; and is probably also false in fact.

3 Herodotus. Plutarch.
And now I will readily agree with Plau-ndes, that Esop was regretted by the greatest and wisest men of Greece, who testified to the Delphians how much they resented his death. But I add, that the Athenians, in particular, had Esop in so much honour, that they erected for him a magnificent statue in their city; regarding more the greatness of his personal merit, than the meanness of his race and condition. I further say, that the opinion which all the world had conceived of his wisdom and probity, encouraged the poets to make the people believe, that the gods had raised him again to life, as they had done Tyndarus, Hercules, Glaucus, and Hypolitus. Nay, some have not scrupled to affirm, that he lived many years after his resurrection, and fought twice on the side of the Greeks, against the Persians, in the straits of Thermopylae, which which must have been above eighty years after his death. But these are such manifest absurdities, as confute themselves. Neither is it probable, as some have asserted, that he wrote two books concerning what happened to him in the city of Delphi, unless it be supposed that he made two voyages thither, and wrote of the first: for in the last, it is very improbable he should have any time for such a work; neither can it be grounded on the testimony of any author worthy of credit. 'Tis indeed most probable, that he left nothing in writing but his fables; which, either for the elegance of the narration, or the usefulness of their morality, have always been so much esteemed, that many of them have preserved themselves in the memories of men for above two thousand years. Yet I do not assert, that those which Planudes has published, are the very fables which Esop wrote, as Planudes has given us too many occasions to doubt of his sincerity; and also, as he has omitted in his collection many fables, which ancient authors have attributed to Esop. If we we could be certain that it is the genuine work of Esop, we must doubtless confess, that we have no writings in prose more ancient, except the books of Moses, and some others of the Old Testament.

NOTES.

1 Scholiast on Aristophanes, Aves, v. 471. Suidas.

3 Suidas.

4 Dr. Bentley asserts, that it is very uncertain whether Esop left any fables behind him in writing, to which Mr. Boyle answers, that the phrase of antiquity is the same when they mention any thing of Esop's, as it would have been, had they thought Esop really to have written it: the ancients quote him just as they do other authors.

Boyle against Bentley.

There is a passage in Plato's Phaedo, where Socrates says, Among the fables of Esop which I had at hand, and knew to be his, I put those into verse that first occurred
The LIFE of ESOP. xlvii

curred to me. Which words imply, that Socrates made use of a written book of Esop's fables.

Ibid.

Of three passages, proceeds the same writer, which the Doctor has brought to prove Esop no author, two of them prove the direct contrary; and the other proves only, that Dr. Bentley has read somebody, that has read Aristophanes. And is this the irresistible evidence, with which he has taken upon him to confront the opinion of two thousand years? Is it fit that men should make use of their little skill in letters, their conjectures, their fancies, their dreams, to attack the reputation of our first masters in writing? Is it grateful, with such groundless suspicions as these, to fall upon the father of moral fable, whose happy way of conveying knowledge has been ever spoken of with so much respect, and been of such standing use to mankind?

Ibid.

5 It is remarkable, says father Vavassor, that Henry Stephens, in his Thesaurus Linguae Graecae, never cited Esop's fables; which shews that he took them for the work of a modern Greek. It seems probable, nay, almost certain, says he, that Planudes collected the fables of Esop, partly from his ancestors, and partly from reading several authors; that some were his own invention, that he added the the moral and explication, often agreeable to his own fancy, and that the whole was put into his own form and words. He confirms his conjecture by the conformity of style which may be observed between the life of Esop, and the fables: and no one is ignorant that Planudes is the author of that life. Vavassor further observes, that mention is made of the Piraeus in one of Esop's fables. Now the Piraeus was not built till the 76th Olympiad; before that time the Phalerum was the port of the Athenians: so that as Esop died in the 54th Olympiad, long before Themistocles had built the Piraeus, it would have been the Phalerum, and not the Piraeus, that Esop would have mentioned.

But father Vavassor is not the first who has taken Planudes for the author of Esop's fables now extant. Nevelet, who published a collection of fables in 1610, declared himself of this opinion. Of all the manuscripts in my possession, says he, not one had the fables of Esop which now are published, which I imagine to be written by Planudes, as well as Esop's Life. The manuscripts he speaks of, were in the library of Heidelberg, and had furnished him with about 136 fables, which he added to those of Esop already printed, which are about 150; so that Nevelet's collection consisted of 286 fables. Bayle.
The late Dr. Bentley was also of this opinion. I shall examine, says he, those Greek fables now extant, that assume the name of Esop himself. There are two parcels of the present fables; the one, which are more ancient, 136 in number, were first published out of the Heidelberg library, by Nevelet in 1610. The editor himself well observed, that they were falsely ascribed to Esop, because they mention holy monks. To which I will add, says the Doelo, another remark, that there is a sentence out of Job—Naked we all came, and naked shall we return. But because these two passages are in the epimythion, (the moral) and belong not to the fable itself; they may justly be supposed to be additions only, and interpolations of the true book. I shall therefore give some better reasons to prove they are a recent work. That they cannot be Esop’s own, the 181st fable is a demonstrative proof: for that is a story of Demades the rhetor, who lived about 200 years after our Phrygians’s time. The 193 is about Momus’s carping at the works of the gods. He there finds this fault in the bull, That his eyes were not placed in his horns, that he might see where he pushed. But Lucian, speaking of the same fable, has it thus, That his horns were not placed right before his eyes. And Aristotle has it a third way, That his horns were not placed about his shoulders, where he might make the strongest push; but in the tenderest part, his head. I think it probable from hence, that Esop did not write a book of his fables; for then there would not have been such a difference in the telling.—There is great reason to believe they were drawn up by Planudes, a monk of Constantinople, who died in the year 1370: for there is no manuscript, anywhere, above 300 years old, that has the fables according to that copy.—This idot of a monk has also given us a book, which he calls a life of Esop, that perhaps cannot be matched in any language, for ignorance and nonsense. He had picked up two or three true stories; that Esop was a slave to one Xanthus, car-rried a burthen of bread, conversed with Cræsus, and was put to death at Delphi: but the circumstances of these, and all his other tales, are pure invention. He makes Xanthus, an ordinary Lydian, or Samian, to be a philosopher; which word was not heard of in those days, but invented afterwards by Pythagoras. ’Twas the king of Ethiopia’s problem to Amasis, king of Egypt, to drink up the sea: but Planudes makes it a wager of Xanthus with one of his scholars. To say nothing of his chronological errors, mistakes of an hundred or two hundred years, who can read with patience that silly discourse between Xanthus and his man Esop; not a bit better than our penny merriments printed at London bridge.

Bentley on Esop’s fables.
In answer to what Dr. Bentley has said above, concerning the fables of Esop being not written by himself, Mr. Boyle thus argues. Nobody ever imagined that all, or half the fables, that have gone under the name of Esop, are his: or that any of them almost, are in the very same words and syllables, that they were in when they came out of his hands. They have doubtless undergone great alterations, some more and some less; but if under all these changes, still the same little story in its chief circumstances, the same simplicity in telling it, the same humorous turn of thought, and in a good measure the same words too, have been preserved; there is enough of Esop left, whereby we may make a true judgment of his spirit, and genius, and manner of performance. When Dr. Bentley shall clearly have made out, either that none of these fables came from Esop himself; or, if they did, yet that in the very form and cast of them, as well as the expression, they have been since so totally altered, that they deserve not to be called the same; it will then be time enough to own, that we are unable to judge of Esop’s merit by anything in the present collection: but till that is done, we may safely enjoy our opinions, and they that have admired Esop, may venture to go on, and admire him still.

As for what the Doctor has said of Planudes, I must confess, says Mr. Boyle, I have not the deepest veneration for his character; but neither can I think so despicably... cably of him as the lofty Dr. Bentley does, because I find him well spoken of by men of good knowledge and judgment, and even by his adversaries themselves. Nay, Dr. Bentley, I think, gives an account of him, not at all to his disadvantage, where he says, that the set of fables he put out, was of his own drawing up: amongst which, there are several so well turned, so exactly copied from nature, and built on such a true knowledge of human life and affairs, that 'tis plain he was neither an ideot nor a monk, that composed them. But the only reason Dr. Bentley gives for his believing them to be drawn up by Planudes, is, that there is no manuscript, any where, above 300 years old, that has the fables according to that copy. No manuscript! any where! Very extensive words: 'tis pretty difficult to answer for all the libraries of Europe. But this was an assertion fit to be laid down by Dr. Bentley, because impossible to be proved; and I believe not difficult to be disproved: for, as much out of the way of these things as I live, I have casually heard of a manuscript, older than Planudes, that has the fables according to his copy; Vossius's manuscript I mean, which, though I have not seen it myself, yet better judges than I am, who have seen it, assure me, that it is about 500 years old, and that Vossius himself always esteemed it so. 'Tis at Leyden.

Boyle against Bentley-
Fabricius doubts of this manuscript of Vossius mentioned by Boyle; it requires, he says, further examination. Montfaucon promised, (in his Diarium Italicum) that he would publish from a manuscript of the monastery of St. Mary at Florence, the life of Esop, with the fables, as they were extant before the time of Planudes, more at large: (in a diffuse style) for that Planudes had omitted some fables, and had written both the life and the fables in a very different style, and after his own manner.

Fabricius.

I suppose Montfaucon never fulfilled his promise.
AN ESSAY ON FABLE.
AN ESSAY on FABLE.

Introduction.

WHOEVER undertakes to compose a fable, whether of the sublimer and more complex kind, as the epick and dramatick; or of the lower and more simple, as what has been called the Esophagean; should make it his principal intention to illustrate some one moral or prudential maxim. To this point the composition in all its parts must be directed; and this will lead him to describe some action proper to enforce the maxim he has chosen. In several respects therefore the greater fable and the less agree. It is the business of both to teach some particular moral, exemplified by an action, and this enlivened by natural incidents. Both alike must be supported by apposite and proper characters, and both be furnished with sentiments and language suitable to the character thus employed. I would by no means however infer, that, to produce one of these small pieces requires the same degree of genius, as to form an epick or dramatick Fable. All I would insinuate, is, that that the apologue has a right to some share of our esteem, from the relation it bears to the poems before mentioned: as it is honourable to spring from a noble stem, although in ever so remote a branch. A perfect fable, even of this inferior kind, seems a much stronger proof of genius than the mere narrative of an event. The latter indeed requires judgment: the former, together with judgment, demands an effort of the imagination.

Having thus endeavoured to procure these little compositions as much regard as they may fairly claim, I proceed to treat of some particulars most essential to their character.

SECT I.

Of the Truth or Moral of a Fable.

'Tis the very essence of a Fable to convey some Moral or useful Truth, beneath the shadow of an allegory. It is this chiefly that distinguishes a Fable from a Tale; and indeed gives it the pre-eminence in point of use and dignity. A Tale may consist of an event either serious or comic; and, provided it be told agreeably, may be excellent in its kind, though it should imply no sort of Moral. But the action of a Fable is contrived on purpose to teach and to imprint some Truth;
Truth; and should clearly and obviously include the illustration of it in the very catastrophe.

The Truth to be preferred on this occasion should neither be too obvious, nor trite, nor trivial. Such would ill deserve the pains employed in Fable to convey it. As little also should it be one that is very dubious, dark, or controverted. It should be of such a nature, as to challenge the assent of every ingenious and sober judgment; never a point of mere speculation; but tending to inform or remind the reader, of the proper means that lead to happiness, or at least, to the several duties, decorums, and proprieties of conduct, which each particular Fable endeavours to enforce.

The reason why Fable has been so much esteemed in all ages and in all countries; is perhaps owing to the polite manner in which its maxims are conveyed. The very article of giving instruction supposes at least, a superiority of wisdom in the adviser; a circumstance by no means favourable to the ready admission of advice. 'Tis the peculiar excellence of Fable to wave this air of superiority: it leaves the reader to collect the moral; who by thus discovering more than is shewn him, finds his principle of self-love gratified, fied, instead of being disgusted. The attention is either taken off from the adviser; or, if otherwise, we are at least flattered by his humility and address.
An Essay on Fable.

Besides, instruction, as conveyed by Fable, does not only lay aside its lofty mien and supercilious aspect, but appears dressed in all the smiles and graces which can strike the imagination, or engage the passions. It pleases in order to convince; and it imprints its moral so much the deeper, in proportion as it entreats; so that we may be said to feel our duties at the very instant we comprehend them.

I am very sensible with what difficulty a Fable is brought to a strict agreement with the foregoing account of it. This however ought to be the writer's aim. 'Tis the simple manner in which the Morals of Esop are interwoven with his Fables, that distinguishes him, and gives him the preference to all other mythologists. His Mountain delivered of a Mouse, produces the Moral of his Fable, in ridicule of pompous pretenders; and his Crow, when she drops her cheese, lets fall, as it were by accident, the strongest admonition against the power of flattery. There is no need of a separate sentence to explain it; no possibility possibility of impressing it deeper, by that load we too often see of accumulated reflections. Indeed the Fable of the Cock and the Precious Stone is in this respect very exceptionable. The lesson it inculcates is so dark and ambiguous, that different expositors have given it quite opposite interpretations; some imputing the Cock's rejection of the Diamond to his wisdom, and others to his ignorance.

Strictly speaking then, one should render needless any detached or explicit moral. Esop, the father of this kind of writing, disclaimed any such assistance. 'Tis the province of Fable to give it birth in the mind of the person for whom it is intended: otherwise the precept is direct, which is contrary to the nature and end of allegory. However, in order to give all necessary assistance to young readers, an Index is added to this collection, containing the subject or moral of each Fable, to which the reader may occasionally apply.

After all, the greatest fault in any composition (for I can hardly allow that name to riddles) is obscurity. There can be no purpose answered by a work that is unintelligible. Annibal Caracci and Raphael himself, rather than risque so unpardonable pardonable a fault, have admitted verbal explanations into some of their best pictures. It must be confessed, that every story is not capable of telling its own Moral. In a case of this nature, and this only, it should be expressly introduced. Perhaps also, where the point is doubtful, we ought to shew enough for the less acute, even at the hazard of shewing too much for the more sagacious; who, for this very reason, that they are more sagacious, will pardon a superfluity which is such to them alone.

It was probably intended to point out that the best profession

But, on these occasions, it has been matter of dispute, whether the moral is better introduced at the end or beginning of a Fable. Esop, as I said before, universally rejected any separate Moral. Those we now find at the close of his Fables, were placed there by other hands. Among the ancients, Prædrus; and Gay, among the moderns, inserted theirs at the beginning: La Motte prefers them at the conclusion; and Fontaine disposes of them indiscriminately, at the beginning or end, as he sees convenient. If, amidst the authority of such great names, I might venture to mention my own opinion, I should rather prefix them as an introduction, than add them as an appendage. For I would neither pay my reader nor myself so bad a compliment, as to suppose, after after he had read the Fable, that he was not able to discover its meaning. Besides, when the Moral of a Fable is not very prominent and striking, a leading thought at the beginning puts the reader in a proper track. He knows the game which he pursues: and, like a beagle on a warm scent, he follows the sport with alacrity, in proportion to his intelligence. On the other hand, if he has no previous intimation of the design, he is puzzled throughout the Fable; and cannot determine upon its merit without the trouble of a fresh perusal. A ray of light, imparted at first, may shew him the tendency and propriety of every expression as he goes along; but while he travels in the dark, no wonder if he stumble or mistake his way.

S E C T. II.

Of the Action and Incidents proper for a Fable.

In choosing the action or allegory, three conditions are altogether expedient. I. It must be clear: that is, it ought to shew without equivocation, precisely and obviously, what we intend should be understood. II. It must be one and entire. That is, it must not be composed of separate and independent actions, but must tend in all its circumstances to the completion of one single event. III. It must be natural; that is, founded, if nor on Truth, at least, on Probability; on popular opinion; on that relation and analogy which things bear to one another, when we have gratuitously endowed them with the human faculties of speech and reason. And these conditions are taken from the nature of the human mind; which cannot endure to be embarrassed, to be bewildered, or to be deceived.

A Fable offends against prespicuity, when it leaves us doubtful what Truth the Fabulist intended to convey. We have a striking example of this in Dr. Croxall's Fable of the creaking wheel. "A coachman, says he, hearing one of his wheels creak, was surprised; but more especially, when he perceived that it was the worst wheel of the whole set, and which he thought had but little pretence to take such a liberty. But, upon his demanding the reason why it did so, the wheel replied, that it was natural for people who laboured under any affliction or calamity to complain." Who would imagine this Fable designed, as the author informs us, for an admonition to repress, or keep our complaints to ourselves, or if we must let our sorrows speak, to take care it be done in solitude and retirement. The story of this Fable is not well imagined: at least, if meant to support the Moral which the author has drawn from it.
An E S S A Y on F A B L E.

A Fable is faulty in respect to unity; when the several circumstances point different ways; and do not center, like so many lines, in one distinct and unambiguous Moral. An example of this kind is furnished by La Motte in the observation he makes on Fontaine's two pigeons. "These pigeons had a reciprocal affection for each other. One of them shewing a desire to travel, was earnestly opposed by his companion, but in vain. The former sets out upon his rambles, and encounters a thousand unforeseen dangers; while the latter suffers almost as much at home, through his apprehensions for his roving friend. However, our traveller, after many hair-breadth escapes, returns at length in safety back, and the two pigeons are, once again, mutually happy in each other's company." Now the application of this Fable is utterly vague and uncertain, for want of circumstances to determine, whether the author designed principally to represent the dangers of the Traveller: his friend's anxiety during his absence; or their mutual happiness on his return. Whereas, had the travelling pigeon met with no disasters on his way, but only found all pleasures insipid for want of his friend's participation; and had he returned from no other motive, than a desire of seeing him again, the whole then had happily closed in this one conspicuous inference, inference, that the presence of a real friend is the most desirable of all gratifications.
An Essay on Fable.

The last rule I have mentioned, that a Fable should be natural, may be violated several ways. 'Tis opposed, when we make creatures enter into unnatural associations. Thus the sheep or the goat must not be made to hunt with the lion; and it is yet more absurd, to represent the lion as falling in love with the forester's daughter. 'Tis infringed, by ascribing to them appetites and passions that are not consistent with their known characters; or else by employing them in such occupations, as are foreign and unsuitable to their respective natures. A fox should not be paid to long for grapes; an hedgehog pretend to drive away flies; nor a partridge offer his service to delve in the vineyard. A ponderous iron and an earthen vase should not swim together down a river; and he that should make his goose lay golden eggs, would shew a luxuriant fancy, but very little judgment. In short, nothing besides the faculty of speech and reason, which Fable has been allowed to confer even upon inanimates, must ever contradict the nature of things, or at least, the commonly received opinion concerning them.

Opinions
Opinions indeed, although erroneous, if they either are, or have been universally received, may afford sufficient foundation for a Fable. The mandrake, here, may be made to utter groans; and the dying swan, to pour forth her elegy. The sphinx and the phœnix, the syren and the centaur, have all the existence that is requisite for Fable. Nay, the goblin, the fairy, and even the man in the moon, may have each his province allotted him, provided it be not an improper one. Here the notoriety of opinion supplies the place of fact, and in this manner truth may fairly be deduced from falsehood.

Concerning the incidents proper for Fable, it is a rule without exception, that they ought always to be few; it being foreign to the nature of this composition to admit of much variety. Yet a Fable with only one single incident may possibly appear too naked. If Esop and Phædrus are herein sometimes too sparing, Fontaine and La Motte are as often too profuse. In this, as in most other matters, a medium certainly is best. In a word, the incidents should not only be few, but short; and like those in the Fables of “the swallow and other birds,” “the miller and his son,” and “the court and country-mouse,” they must must naturally arise out of the subject, and serve to illustrate and enforce the Moral.

SECT. III.

Of the Persons, Characters, and Sentiments of Fable.

THE race of animals first present themselves as the proper actors in this little drama. They are indeed a species that approaches, in many respects, so near to our own, that we need only lend them speech, in order to produce a striking resemblance. It would however be unreasonable, to expect a strict and universal similitude. There is a certain measure and degree of analogy, with which the most discerning reader will rest contented: for instance, he will accept the properties of animals, although necessary and invariable, as the images of our inclinations, tho' never so free. To require more than this, were to sap the very foundations of allegory; and even to deprive ourselves of half the pleasure that flows from poetry in general.

Solomon sends us to the ant, to learn the wisdom of industry: and our inimitable ethic poet introduces nature herself as giving us a similar kind of counsel.

Thus
Thus then to Man the voice of Nature spake;
"Go, from the Creatures thy instructions take—
"There all the forms of social union find,
"And thence, let reason late instruct mankind."

He supposes that animals in their native characters, without the advantages of speech and reason which are designed them by the Fabulists, may in regard to Morals as well as Arts, become examples to the human race. Indeed, I am afraid we have so far deviated into ascetic appetites and fantastical manners, as to find the expediency of copying from them that simplicity we ourselves have loft. If animals in themselves may be thus exemplary, how much more may they be made instructive, under the direction of an able Fabulist; who by conferring upon them the gift of language, contrives to make their instincts more intelligible and their examples more determinate!

But these are not his only actors. The Fabulist has one advantage above all other writers whatsoever; as all the works both of art and nature are more immediately at his disposal. He has, in this respect, a liberty not allowed to epic, or dramatik writers; who are undoubtedly more limited in the choice of persons to be employed. He has authority to press into his service every kind of existence under heaven: not only beasts, birds, insects, and all the animal creation; but flowers, shrubs, trees, and all the tribe of vegetables. Even mountains, fossils, minerals, and the inanimate works of nature, discourse articulately at his command, and act the part which he assigns them. The virtues, vices, and every property of beings, receive from him a local habitation and a name. In short he may personify, bestow life, speech and action, on whatever he thinks proper.

It is easy to imagine what a source of novelty and variety this must open, to a genius capable of receiving, and of employing, these ideal persons in a proper manner; what an opportunity it affords him to diversify his images, and to treat the fancy with change of objects; while he strengthens the understanding, or regulates the passions, by a succession of Truths. To raise beings like these into a state of action and intelligence, gives the Fabulist an undoubted claim to that first character of the poet, a Creator. I rank him not, as I said before, with the writers of epick or dramatick poems; but the maker of pins or needles is as much an artist, as an anchor-smith:
smith: and a painter in miniature may shew as much skill, as he who paints in the largest proportions.

When these persons are once raised, we must carefully injoin them proper tasks; and assign them sentiments and language suitable to their several natures, and respective properties.

A raven should not be extolled for her voice, nor a bear be represented with an elegant shape. 'Twere a very obvious instance of absurdity, to paint an hare, cruel; or a wolf, compassionate. An ass were but ill qualified to be General of an army, though he may well enough serve perhaps for one of the trumpeters. But so long as popular opinion allows to the lion, magnanimity; rage, to the tiger; strength, to the mule; cunning, to the fox; and buffoonery, to the monkey; why may not they support the characters of an Agamemnon, Achilles, Ajax, Ulysses and Thersites? The truth is, when moral actions are with judgment attributed to the brute creation. we scarce perceive that nature is at all violated by the Fabulist. He appears, at most, to have only translated their language. His lions, wolves, and foxes, behave and argue as thole creatures

tures would, had they originally been endowed with the human faculties of speech and reason.

But greater art is yet required, whenever we personify inanimate beings. Here the copy so far deviates from the great lines of nature, that, without the nicest care, reason will revolt against the fiction. However, beings of this sort, managed ingeniously and with address, recommend the Fabulist's invention by the grace of novelty and of variety. Indeed the analogy between things natural and artificial, animate and inanimate, is often so very striking, that we can, with seeming propriety, give passions and sentiments to every individual part of existence. Appearance favours the deception. The vine may be enamoured of the elm; her embraces testify her passion. The dwelling mountain may, naturally enough, be delivered of a mouse. The gourd may reproach the pine, and the sky-rocket insult the stars. The axe may solicit a new handle of the forest; and the moon, in her female character, request a fashionable garment. Here is nothing incongruous; nothing that shocks the reader with impropriety. On the other hand, were the axe to desire a fine periwig, and the moon petition for a new pair of boots; probability would then be violated, and the absurdity become too glaring.

S E C T.
S E C T. IV.

On the Language of Fable.

The most beautiful Fables that ever were invented, may be disfigured by the Language in which they are clothed. Of this, poor Esop, in some of his English dresses, affords a melancholy proof. The ordinary style of Fable should be familiar, but it should also be elegant. Were I to instance any style that I should prefer on this occasion, it should be that of Mr. Addison's little tales in the Spectator. That ease and simplicity, that conciseness and propriety, that subdued and decent humour he so remarkably discovers in those compositions; seem to have qualified him for a Fabulist, almost beyond any other writer. But to return.

The Familiar, says Mr. La Motte, to whose ingenious Essay I have often been obliged in this discourse, is the general tone or accent of Fable. It was thought sufficient, on its first appearance, to lend the animals our most common language. Nor indeed have they any extraordinary pretensions to the sublime; it being requisite they should speak with the same simplicity that they behave.
The familiar also is more proper for insinuation, than the elevated; this being the language of reflection, as the former is the voice of sentiment. We guard ourselves against the one, but lie open to the other; and instruction will always the most effectually sway us, when it appears least jealous of its rights and privileges.

The familiar style however that is here required, notwithstanding that appearance of Ease which is its character, is perhaps more difficult to write, than the elevated or sublime. A writer more readily perceives when he has risen above the common language; than he perceives, in speaking this language, whether he has made the choice that is most suitable to the occasion: and it is nevertheless, upon this happy choice that all the charm of the familiar depends. Moreover, the elevated style deceives and seduces, although it be not the best chosen; whereas the familiar can procure itself no sort of respect, if it be not easy, natural, just, delicate, and unaffected. A Fabulist must therefore bestow great attention upon his style: and even labour it so much the more, that it may appear to have cost him no pains at all.

The authority of Fontaine justifies this opinion in regard to style. His Fables are perhaps the best best examples of the genteel familiar, as Sir Roger L'Estrange affords the grossest, of the indelicate and low. When we read that "while the frog and the mouse were disputing it at sword's point, down comes a kite powdering upon them in the interim, and gobbets up both together to part the fray." And where the fox reproaches "a bevy of jolly gossipping wenches making merry over a dish of pullets, that, if he but peeped into a hen-roost, they always made a bawling with their dogs and their bastards; while you yourselves, says he, can lie stuffing your guts with your hens and your capons, and not a word of the pudding." This may be familiar, but is also coarse and vulgar; and cannot fail to disgust a reader that has the least degree of taste or delicacy.

The style of Fable then must be simple and familiar; and it must likewise be correct and elegant. By the former, I would advise that it should not be loaded with figure and metaphor; that the disposition of words be natural; the turn of sentences, easy; and their construction, unembarrassed. By elegance, I would exclude all coarse and provincial terms; all affected and puerile conceits; all obsolete and pedantick phrases. To this I would adjoin, as the word perhaps implies, a certain finishing polish, which gives a grace and spirit to the whole; and which, tho' it have always the appearance of nature, is almost ever the effect of art.

But, notwithstanding all that has been said, there are some occasions on which it is allowable, and even expedient to change the style. The language of a Fable must rise or fall in conformity to the subject. A Lion, when introduced in his regal capacity, must hold discourse in a strain somewhat more elevated than a Country-Mouse. The lioness then becomes his Queen, and the beasts of the forest are called his Subjects: a method that offers at once to the imagination, both the animal and the person he is designed to represent. Again, the buffoon-monkey should avoid that pomp of phrase, which the owl employs as her best pretence to wisdom. Unless the style be thus judiciously varied, it will be impossible to preserve a just distinction of character.

Descriptions, at once concise and pertinent, add a grace to Fable; but are then most happy, when included in the action: whereof the Fable of Boreas and the Sun affords us an example. An epithet well chosen is often a description in itself; and so much the more agreeable, as it the less retards us in our pursuit of the catastrophe.
I might enlarge much further on the subject, but perhaps I may appear to have been too diffuse already. Let it suffice to hint, that little strokes of humour, when arising naturally from the subject; and incidental reflections, when kept in due subordination to the principal, add a value to these compositions. These latter however should be employed very sparingly, and with great address; be very few and very short: It is scarcely enough that they naturally result from the subject: they should be such as may appear necessary and essential parts of the Fable. And when these embellishments, pleasing in themselves, tend to illustrate the main action, they then afford that nameless grace remarkable in Fontaine and some few others; and which persons of the best discernment will more easily conceive, than they can explain.

R. DODSLEY.
1. The Trees and the Bramble.
2. The Trees desire a King.
3. The Wolf and Shepherds.
4. The Belly and Limbs.
5. The Fox and Swallow.
6. The Fox and Crow.
7. The Fox and Stork.
8. Num with borrowed Feathers.
10. Mountain in labour.
11. The Boys and Frogs.
12. Sack and her Young.
FABLES.
BOOK I.
FROM THE ANCIENTS.
FABLE I.

The Trees and the Bramble.

THE Israelites, ever murmuring and discontented under the reign of Jehovah, were desirous of having a king, like the rest of the nations. They offered the kingdom to Gideon their deliverer; to him, and to his posterity after him: he generously refused their offer, and reminded them, that Jehovah was their king. When Gideon was dead, Abimelech, his son by a concubine, flew all his other sons to the number of seventy, Joatham alone escaping; and by the assistance of the Shechemites made himself king. Joatham, to repre-fent to them their folly, and to shew them, that the most deserving are generally the least ambitious, whereas the worthless grasp at power with eagerness, and exercise it with insolence and tyranny, spake to them in the following manner.

Hearken unto me, ye men of Shechem, so may God hearken unto you. The Trees, grown weary of the state of freedom and equality in which God had placed them, met together to chuse and to anoint a king over them: and they said to the Olive-tree, Reign thou over us. But the Olive-tree said unto them, Shall I quit my fatness wherewith God and man is honoured, to disquiet myself with the cares of government, and to rule over the Trees? And they said unto the Fig-tree, Come thou, and reign over us. But the Fig-tree said unto them, Shall I bid adieu to my sweetness and my pleasant fruit; to take upon me the painful charge of royalty, and to be set over the Trees? Then said the Trees unto the Vine, Come thou and reign over us. But the Vine said also unto them, Shall I leave my wine which honoureth God and cheareth man, to bring upon myself nothing but trouble and anxiety, and to become king of the Trees? we are happy in our present lot: seek some other to reign over you. Then said all the Trees unto the Bramble, Bramble, Come thou and reign over us. And the Bramble said unto them, I will be your king; come ye all under my shadow, and be safe; obey me, and I will grant you my protection. But if you obey me not, out of the Bramble shall come forth a fire, which shall devour even the cedars of Lebanon.

F A B L E II.

The Frogs petitioning Jupiter for a King.

As Esop was travelling over Greece, he happened to pass thro' Athens just after Pisistratus had abolished the popular state, and usurped a sovereign power; when perceiving that the Athenians bore the yoke, tho' mild and easy, with much impatience, he related to them the following fable.

The commonwealth of Frogs, a discontented, variable race, weary of liberty, and fond of change, petitioned Jupiter to grant them a king. The good-natured deity, in order to indulge this their request, with as little mischief to the petitioners as possible, threw them down a log. At first they regarded their new monarch with great reverence, and kept from him at a most respectful distance: but perceiving his tame and peaceable disposition, they by degrees ventured to approach him with more familiarity, till at length they conceived for him the utmost contempt. In this disposition, they renewed their request to Jupiter, and intreated him to bestow upon them another king. The Thunderer in his wrath sent them a crane, who no sooner took possession of his new dominions, than he began to devour his subjects one after another in a most capricious and tyrannical manner. They were now far more dissatisfied than before; when applying to Jupiter a third time, they were dismissed with this reproof, that the evil they complained of, they had imprudently brought upon themselves; and that they had no other remedy now but to submit to it with patience.

FABLE III.

The Wolf and the Shepherds.

HOW apt men are to condemn in others, what they practise themselves without scruple!

A Wolf, says Plutarch, peeping into a hut, where a company of Shepherds where regaling themselves with a joint of mutton; Lord, said he, what a clamour would these men have raised, if they had caught me at such a banquet!

FABLE
ANCIENT FABLES.

FABLE IV.
The Belly and the Limbs.

MENENIUS AGrippa, a Roman consul, being deputed by the senate to appease a dangerous tumult and sedition of the people, who refused to pay the taxes necessary for carrying on the business of the state; convinced them of their folly, by delivering to them the following fable.

My friends and country men, said he, attend to my words. It once happened that the members of the human body, taking some exceptions at the conduct of the Belly, resolved no longer to grant him the usual supplies. The Tongue first, in a sedulous speech, aggravated their grievances; and after highly extolling the activity and diligence of the Hands and Feet, set forth how hard and unreasonable it was, that the fruits of their labour should be squandered away upon the insatiable cravings of a fat and indolent Paunch, which was entirely useless, and unable to do any thing towards helping himself. This speech was received with unanimous applause by all the Members. Immediately the Hands declared they would work no more; the Feet determined to carry no farther the load of Guts with which they had hitherto been oppressed; nay, the very Teeth refused to prepare a single morsel more for his use. In this distress, the Belly besought them to consider maturely, and not foment so senseless a rebellion. There is none of you, says he, can be ignorant that whatsoever you bestow upon me, is immediately converted to your use, and dispersed by me for the good of you all into every Limb. But he remonstrated in vain; for during the clamours of passion, the voice of reason is always disregarded. It being therefore impossible for him to quiet the tumult, he starved for want of their assistance, and the body wasted away to a skeleton. The Limbs, grown weak and languid were sensible at last of their error, and would fain have returned to their respective duties; but it was now too late, death had taken possession of the whole, and they all perished together.

B 4 carry
A R I S T O T L E informs us that the following fable was spoken by Esop to the Samians, on a debate upon changing their ministers, who were accused of plundering the commonwealth.

A Fox swimming across a river, happened to be entangled in some weeds that grew near the bank, from which he was unable to extricate himself. As he lay thus exposed to whole swarms of flies, who were galling him and sucking his blood; a Swallow observing his distress, kindly offered to drive them away. By no means, said the Fox; for if these should be chased away, who are already sufficiently gorged, another more hungry swarm would succeed, and I should be robbed of every remaining drop of blood in my veins.

* Instead of the Swallow, it was originally a Hedgehog: but as that creature seemed very unfit for the business of driving away flies, it was thought more proper to substitute the Swallow.
FABLE VI.

The Fox and the Raven.

A Fox observing a Raven perched on the branch of a tree, with a fine piece of cheese in her mouth, immediately began to consider how he might possess himself of so delicious a morsel. Dear madam, said he, I am extremely glad to have the pleasure of seeing you this morning: your beautiful shape, and shining feathers, are the delight of my eyes; and would you condescend to favour me with a song, I doubt not but your voice is equal to the rest of your accomplishments. Deluded with this flattering speech, the transported Raven opened her mouth, in order to give him a specimen of her pipe, when down dropped the cheese: which the Fox immediately snatching up, bore it away in triumph, leaving the Raven to lament her credulous vanity at her leisure.

FABLE VII.

The Fox and the Stork.

The Fox, tho' in general more inclined to roguery than wit, had once a strong inclination to play the wag with his neighbour the Stork.
Ancient Fables.

Stork. He accordingly invited her to dinner in great form; but when it came upon the table, the Stork found it consisted entirely of different soups, served up in broad shallow dishes, so that she could only dip in the end of her bill, but could not possibly satisfy her hunger. The Fox lapped it up very readily, and every now and then, addressed himself to his guest, desired to know how she liked her entertainment; hoped that every thing was seasoned to her mind; and protested he was very sorry to see her eat so sparingly. The Stork, perceiving she was played upon, took no notice, but pretended to like every dish extremely: and at parting pressed the Fox so earnestly to return her visit, that he could not in civility refuse. The day arrived, and he repaired to his appointment; but to his great mortification, when dinner appeared, he found it composed of minced meat, served up in long narrow-necked glasses; so that he was only tantalized with the sight of what it was impossible for him to taste. The Stork thrust in her long bill, and helped herself very plentifully; then turning to Reynard, who was eagerly licking the outside of a jar where some sauce had been spilled—I am very glad, said she smiling, that you seem to have so good an appetite; I hope you will make as hearty a dinner at my table as I did the other day.
day at yours. Reynard hung down his head, and looked very much displeased.—Nay, nay, said the Stork, don't pretend to be out of humour about the matter: they that cannot take a jest should never make one.

F A B L E V I I I.

The Daw with borrowed Feathers.

W H E N a pert young templer, or city apprentice, sets up for a fine gentleman, with the assistance of an embrodered waistcoat and Dresden ruffles, but without one qualification proper to the character; how frequently does it happen, that he is laughed at by his equals, and despised by those whom he prefumed to imitate!

A pragmatical Jackdaw was vain enough to imagine, that he wanted nothing but the coloured plumes, to render him as elegant a bird as the Peacock. Puffed up with this wise conceit, he dressed himself with a sufficient quantity of their most beautiful feathers, and in this borrowed garb, forsaking his old companions, ene-voured to pass for a Peacock. But he no sooner attempted to associate with these genteel creatures, than an affected frut betrayed the vain pretender.
pretender. The offended Peacocks, plucking from him their degraded feathers, soon stripped him of his finery, reduced him to a mere Jackdaw, and drove him back to his brethren; by whom he was now equally despised, and justly punished with derision and contempt.

Fable IX.

The Wolf and the Lamb.

When cruelty and injustice are armed with power, and determined on oppression, the strongest pleas of innocence are preferred in vain.

A Wolf and a Lamb were accidentally quenching their thirst together at the same rivulet. The Wolf stood towards the head of the stream, and the Lamb at some distance below. The injurious beast, resolved on a quarrel, fiercely demands—How dare you disturb the water which I am drinking? The poor Lamb, all trembling, replies, How, I beseech you, can that possibly be the case, since the current sets from you to me? Discouraged by the force of truth, he changes the accusation. Six months ago, says he, you vilely slandered me. Impossible, returns the Lamb, for I was not then born. No matter, it was Ancient Fables.

was your father then, or some of your relations; and immediately seizing the innocent Lamb, he tore him to pieces.

Fable X.

The Mountain in Labour.

A Rumour once prevailed, that a neighbouring Mountain was in Labour; it was affirmed that she had been heard to utter prodigious groans; and a general expectation had been raised, that some extraordinary birth was at hand. Multitudes flocked with much eagerness to be witnesses of the wonderful event: one expecting her to be delivered of a giant; another of some enormous monster; and all were suspended in earnest expectation of somewhat grand and astonishing. When, after waiting with great impatience a considerable time, behold!—out crept a Mouse.

Fable XI.

The Boys and the Frogs.

On the margin of a large lake, which was inhabited by a great number of Frogs, a company of Boys happened to be at play. Their diversion was duck and drake; and whole vollies of of stones were thrown into the water, to the great annoyance and danger of the poor terrified Frogs. at length one of the most hardy, lifting up his head above the surface of the lake; Ah, dear children, said he, why will ye learn so soon the cruel practices of your race? Consider, I beseech you, that tho' this may be sport to you, it is death to us.

FABLE XII.

The Lark and her Young.

A Lark having built her nest in a field of corn, it grew ripe before her Young were well able to fly. Apprehensive for their safety, she enjoined them, while she went out in order to provide for their subsistence, to listen very attentively to any discourse they might hear about reaping the field. At her return they told her, that the farmer and his son had been there, and had agreed to send to some of their neighbours, to assist them in cutting it down the next day. And so they depend, it seems, upon neighbours, said the mother: very well: then I think we have no occasion to be afraid of tomorrow. The next day she went out, and left them the same injunction as before. When she returned, they acquainted her that the farmer and his son had again been there, but as none of their neighbours came to their assistance, they had deferred reaping till the next day, and intended to send for help to their friends and relations. I think we may still venture another day, says the mother; but however be careful as before, to let me know what passes in my absence. They now inform her, that the farmer and his son had a third time visited the field; and finding that neither friends nor relations had regarded their summons, they were determined to come the next morning and cut it down themselves. Nay, then, replied the Lark, it is time to think of removing: for as they now depend only upon themselves for doing their own business, it will undoubtedly be performed.

Fable XIII.

The Stag drinking.

A Stag quenching his thirst in a clear lake, was struck with the beauty of his horns, which he saw reflected in the water. At the same time, observing the extreme slenderness of his legs; What pity it is, said he, that so fine a creature should be furnished with so despicable a set of spindle shanks! What a truly noble animal I should be, were my legs in any degree answerable fwerable to my horns! In the midst of this foli-loquy, he was alarmed with the cry of a pack of hounds. He immediately flies through the forest, and leaves his pursuers so far behind, that he might probably have escaped; but taking into a thick wood, his horns were entangled in the branches, where he was held till the hounds came up, and tore him in pieces. In his last moments, he thus exclaimed—How ill do we judge of our own true advantages! the legs which I despised would have borne me away in safety, had not my favourite antlers betrayed me to ruin.

F A B L E X I V.

The Swallow and other Birds.

A Swallow observing an husbandman employed in sowing hemp, called the little Birds together, and informed them what the farmer was about. He told them that hemp was the material from which the nets, so fatal to the feathered race, were composed; and advised them unanimously to join in picking it up, in order to prevent the consequences. The Birds either disbelieving his information, or neglecting his advice, gave themselves no trouble about the matter. In a little time the hemp appeared above ground: the friendly Swallow again addressed himself himself to them, told them it was not yet too late, provided they would immediately set about the work, before the seeds had taken too deep root. But they still rejecting his advice, he forsook their society, repaired for safety to towns and cities, there built his habitation and kept his residence. One day, as he was skimming along the streets, he happened to see a large parcel of those very Birds, imprisoned in a cage, on the shoulders of a bird-catcher. Unhappy wretches, said he, you now feel the punishment of your former neglect. But those, who, having no foresight of their own, despise the wholesome admonition of their friends, deserve the mischief which their own obstinacy or negligence brings upon their heads.

FABLE XV.

The Ass and the Lap-dog.

An Ass, who lived in the same house with a favourite Lap-dog, observing the superior degree of affection which the little minion enjoyed, imagined he had nothing more to do, in order to obtain an equal share, in the good graces of the family, than to imitate the Lap-dog's playful and endearing carefies. Accordingly, he began to frisk about before his master, kicking up his 13. The Stag drinking.
14. The Swallow & other Birds.
15. The Ass and the Lap Dog.
16. The Lion and the Mouse.
17. The Wolf and the Crane.
18. Countryman and Snake.
19. The Dog & the Shadow.
20. The Sun & the Wind.
22. Fortune & the Schoolboy.
23. The Frog and the Ox.
24. Lion & other Beasts hunting.
his heels and braying, in an awkward affectation of wantonness and pleasantr.y. This strange behaviour could not fail of raising much laughter, which the As mistaking for approbation and encouragement, he proceeded to leap upon his master's breast, and began very familiarly to lick his face: but he was presently convinced by the force of a good cudgel, that what is sprightly and agreeable in one, may in another be justly cen- sured as rude and impertinent; and that the surest way to gain esteem, is for every one to act suitably to his own natural genius and character.

FABLE XVI.

The Lion and the Mouse.

A Lion by accident laid his paw upon a poor innocent Mouse. The frightened little crea- ture, imagining she was just going to be devoured, begged hard for her life, urged that clemency was the fairest attribute of power, and earnestly intreated his majesty not to stain his illustrious paws with the blood of so insignificant an animal: upon which, the Lion very generously set her at liberty. It happened a few days afterwards, that the Lion ranging for his prey, fell into the toils of the hunter. The Mouse heard his roarings, knew the voice of her benefactor, and immediately repairing to his assistance gnawed in pieces the meshes of the net, and by delivering her preserver, convinced him that there is no creature so much below another, but may have it in his power to return a good office.

FABLE XVII.

The Wolf and the Crane.

_A Wolf having with too much greediness swallowed a bone, it unfortunately stuck in his throat; and in the violence of his pain he applied to several animals, earnestly intreating them to extract it. None cared to hazard the dangerous experiment, except the Crane; who, persuaded by his solemn promises of a gratuity, ventured to thrust her enormous length of neck down his throat, and having successfully performed the operation, claimed the recompence. See the unreasonableness of some creatures, said the Wolf: have I not suffered thee safely to draw thy neck out of my jaws, and haft thou the conscience to demand a further reward!*

---

_FABLE_
ANCIENT FABLES.

FABLE XVIII.
The Countryman and the Snake.

An honest Countryman observed a Snake lying under a hedge, almost frozen to death. He was moved with compassion; and bringing it home, he laid it near the fire, and gave it some new milk. Thus fed and cherished, the creature presently began to revive: but no sooner had he recovered strength enough to do mischief, than he sprung upon the Countryman's wife, bit one of his children, and in short, threw all the whole family into confusion and terror. Ungrateful wretch! said the man, thou hast sufficiently taught me how ill-judged it is, to confer benefits on the worthless and undeserving. So saying, he snatched up a hatchet, and cut the Snake in pieces.

FABLE XIX.
The Dog and the Shadow.

An hungry Spaniel, having stolen a piece of flesh from a butchers's shop, was carrying it across a river. The water being clear, and the sun shining brightly, he saw his own Image in the stream, and fancied it to be another dog, with a more delicious morsel: upon which, unjustly and greedily opening his jaws to snatch at the shadow, he lost the substance.

FABLE XX.

The Sun and the Wind.

Phoebus and AEolus had once a dispute, which of them could soonest prevail with a certain traveller to part with his cloak. AEolus began the attack, and assaulted him with great violence. But the man wrapping his cloak still closer about him, doubled his efforts to keep it, and went on his way. And now Phoebus darted his warm insinuating rays, which melting the traveller by degrees, at length obliged him to throw aside that cloak, which all the rage of AEolus could not compel him to resign. Learn hence, said Phoebus to the blustering god, that soft and gentle means will often accomplish, what force and fury can never effect.

FABLE XXI.

The Wolf and the Mastiff.

A lean half-starved wolf inadvertently strolled in the way of a strong well-fed Mastiff. The Wolf being much too weak to act upon the offensive, offensive, thought it most prudent to accost honest Towser in a friendly manner: and among other civilities, very complaisantly congratulated him on his goodly appearance. Why, yes, returned the Mastiff, I am indeed in tolerable case; and if you will follow me, you may soon be altogether in as good a plight. The Wolf pricked up his ears at the proposal, and requested to be informed what he must do to earn such plentiful meals. Very little, replied the Mastiff; only drive away beggars, cares my master, and be civil to his family. To these conditions the hungry Wolf had no objection, and very readily consented to follow his new acquaintance wherever he would conduct him. As they were trotting along, the Wolf observed that the hair was worn in a circle round his friend's neck; which raised his curiosity to enquire what was the occasion of it. Nothing, answered the Mastiff, or a mere trifle; perhaps the collar to which my chain is sometimes fastened. Chain! replied the Wolf, with much surprise; it should seem then that you are not permitted to rove about where and when you please. Not always, returned Towser, hanging down his head; but what does that signify? it signifies so much, rejoined the Wolf, that I am resolved to have no share in your dinners; half a meal with liberty, is in my estimation, preferable to a full one without it.
ancient fables.

fable xxii.

fortune and the school-boy.

a school-boy, fatigued with play, threw himself down by the brink of a deep pit, where he fell fast asleep. fortune happening to pass by, saw him in this dangerous situation, and kindly gave him a tap on the shoulder: my dear child, said she, if you had fallen into this pit, i should have borne the blame; though in fact, the accident would have been wholly owing to your own carelessness.

misfortune, said a celebrated cardinal, is but another word for imprudence. the maxim is by no means absolutely true: certain however, it is, that mankind suffer more evils from their own imprudence, than from events which it is not in their power to control.

fable xxiii.

the frog and the ox.

a frog being wonderfully struck with the size and majesty of an ox, that was grazing in the marshes, could not forbear endeavouring to expand expand herself to the same portly magnitude. After puffing and swelling for some time: "What think you, sister," said she, "will this do?" Far from it. "Will this?" By no means. "But this surely will." Nothing like it. In short, after many ridiculous efforts to the same fruitless purpose, the simple Frog burst her skin, and miserably expired upon the spot.

FABLE XXIV.

The Lion and other Beasts hunting in partnership.

A Leopard, a Lynx, and a Wolf were ambitious of the honour of hunting with the Lion. His savage majesty graciously condescended to their desire, and it was agreed that they should all have an equal share in whatever might be taken. They scour the forest, are unanimous in the pursuit; and, after a very fine chase, pulled down a noble stag. It was divided with great dexterity by the Lynx, into four equal parts; but just as each was going to secure his share—Hold, says the Lion, let no one presume to serve himself, till he hath heard our just and reasonable claims. I seize upon the first quarter by virtue of my prerogative; the second I think is due to my superior conduct and courage; I cannot forego the third on account of the necessities of my den; and and if any one is inclined to dispute my right to the fourth, let him speak. Awed by the majesty of his frown, and the terror of his paws, they silently withdrew, resolving never to hunt again but with their equals.

FABLE XXV.

The Ant and the Fly.

An Ant and a Fly had once a ridiculous contest about precedency, and were arguing which of the two was the more honourable: such disputes most frequently happen amongst the lowest and most worthless creatures. The Fly expressed great resentment, that such a poor crawling insect should presume to lie basking in the same sunshine, with one so much her superior! Thou hast not surely the insolence, said she, to imagine thyself of an equal rank with me. I am none of your mechanic creatures who live by their industry; but enjoy in plenty, and without labour, every thing that is truly delicious. I place myself uncontrouled upon the hands of kings; I kiss with freedom the lips of beauties; and feast upon the choicest sacrifices that are offered to the gods. To eat with the gods, replied the Ant, and to enjoy the favours of the fair and the powerful, would be great honour indeed. indeed to one who was an invited, or a welcome guest; but an impertinent intruder, who is driven out with aversion and contempt where-ever he appears, has not much cause methinks to boast of his privileges. And as to the honour of not labouring for your subsistence; here too your boast is only your disgrace; for hence it is, that one half of the year you are destitute even of the common necessaries of life; whilst I, at the same time, returning to the hoarded granaries which my honest industry has filled, enjoy every satisfaction, independent of the favour, either of beauties or of kings.

Fable XXVI.

The Bear and the two Friends.

Two Friends, setting out together upon a journey which led through a dangerous forest, mutually promised to assist each other, if they should happen to be assaulted. They had not proceeded far, before they perceived a Bear making towards them with great rage. There were no hopes in flight; but one of them, being very active, sprung up into a tree; upon which, the other, throwing himself flat on the ground, held his breath, and pretended to be dead; remembering to have heard it asserted, that this creature will not prey upon a dead carcase. The Bear came up, and after smelling to him some time, left him, and went on. When he was fairly out of sight and hearing, the hero from the tree calls out—Well, my Friend, what said the Bear? He seemed to whisper you very closely. He did so, replied the other, and gave me this good piece of advice; never to associate with a wretch, who in the hour of danger will desert his Friend.

FABLE XXVII.

The Bull and the Gnat.

A Conceited Gnat, fully persuaded of his own importance, having placed himself on the horn of a Bull, expressed great uneasiness lest his weight should be inconvenient; and with much ceremony begged the Bull’s pardon for the liberty he had taken; assuring him that he would immediately remove, if he pressed too hard upon him. Give yourself no uneasiness on that account, replied the Bull, I beseech you: for as I never perceived when you fate down, I shall probably not miss you whenever you think fit to rise up.
ANCIENT FABLES.

FABLE XXVIII.

The Wasps and the Bees.

PRETENDERS of every kind are best detected by appealing to their works.

Some honey-combs being claimed by a swarm of Wasps, the right owners protested against their demand, and the cause was referred to a Hornet. Witnesses being examined, they deposed that certain winged creatures, who had a loud hum, were of a yellowish colour, and somewhat like Bees, were observed a considerable time hovering about the place where this nest was found. But this did not sufficiently decide the question; for these characteristics, the Hornet observed, agreed no less with the Bees than with the Wasps. At length a sensible old Bee offered to put the matter upon this decisive issue; Let a place be appointed, by the court, said he, for the plaintiffs and defendants to work in: it will then soon appear which of us are capable of forming such regular cells, and afterwards of filling them with so delicious a fluid. The Wasps refusing to agree to this proposal, sufficiently convinced the judge on which side the right lay: and he decreed the honey-combs accordingly.

FABLE
FABLE XXIX.

The Old Man and Death.

A Feeble Old Man, quite spent with carrying a burthen of sticks, which with much labour he had gathered in a neighbouring wood, called upon Death to release him from the fatigues he endured. Death hearing the invocation, was immediately at his elbow, and asked him what he wanted. Frightened and trembling at the unexpected appearance—O good sir! said he, my burthen had like to have slipt from me, and being unable to recover it myself, I only implored your assistance to replace it on my shoulders.

FABLE XXX.

The Court and Country-Mouse.

A Contented Country-Mouse had once the honour to receive a visit from an old acquaintance belonging to the Court. The Country-Mouse, extremely glad to see her guest, very hospitably set before her the best cheese and bacon which her cottage afforded; and as to their beverage, it was the purest water from the spring. The repast was homely indeed, but the welcome hearty: they sate and chatted away the evening together together very agreeably, and then retired in peace and quietness each to her little cell. The next morning when the guest was to take her leave, she kindly pressed her country friend to accompany her; setting forth in very pompous terms, the great elegance and plenty in which she lived at Court. The Country-Mouse was easily prevailed upon, and they set out together. It was late in the evening when they arrived at the palace; however, in one of the rooms, they found the remains of a sumptuous entertainment. There were creams, and jellies, and sweetmeats; and every thing, in short, of the most delicate kind: the cheese was Parmesan: and they wetted their whiskers in exquisite Champaign. But before they had half finished their repast, they were alarmed with the barking and scratching of a lap-dog; then the mewing of a cat frightened them almost to death; by and by, a whole train of servants burst into the room: and every thing was swept away in an instant. Ah! my dear friend, said the Country-Mouse, as soon as she had recovered courage enough to speak, if your fine living is thus interrupted with fears and dangers, let me return to my plain food, and my peaceful cottage; for what is elegance without ease; or plenty, with an aching heart.
A Fox and a Goat travelling together, in a very sultry day, found themselves exceedingly thirsty; when looking round the country in order to discover a place where they might probably meet with water, they at length descried a clear spring at the bottom of a pit. They both eagerly descended, and having sufficiently allayed their thirst, began to consider how they should get out. Many expedients for that purpose were mutually proposed, and rejected. At last the crafty Fox cried out with great joy, I have a thought just struck into my mind, which I am confident will extricate us out of our difficulty: do you, said he to the Goat, only rear yourself up upon your hinder legs, and rest your fore feet against the side of the pit. In this posture, I will climb up to your head; from whence, I shall be able, with a spring, to reach the top: and when I am once there, you are sensible it will be very easy for me to pull you out by the horns. The simple Goat liked the proposal well; and immediately placed himself as directed: by means of which, the Fox without much difficulty, gained the top. And now, said the Goat, give me the assistance assistance you promised. Thou old fool, replied the Fox, hadst thou but half as much brains as beard, thou wouldst never have believed that I would hazard my own life to save thine. However, I will leave with thee a piece of advice, which may be of service to thee hereafter, if thou shouldst have the good fortune to make thy escape; "Never venture into a pit again, before thou haft well considered how to get out of it."

FABLE XXXII.

The Farmer, the Cranes, and the Stork.

A Stork was unfortunately drawn into company with some Cranes, who were just setting out on a party of pleasure, as they called it, which in truth was to rob the fish-ponds of a neighbouring Farmer. Our simple Stork agreed to make one; and it so happened, that they were all taken in the fact. The Cranes having been old offenders, had very little to say for themselves, and were presently dispatched: but the Stork pleaded hard for his life. He urged that it was his first fault, that he was not naturally addicted to stealing fish, that he was famous for piety to his parents, and in short, for many other virtues. Your piety and virtue, said the Farmer, may for aught I know be exemplary; but your being in company with thieves renders it very suspicious; and you must therefore submit with patience to share the same punishment with your companions.

Fable XXXIII.

The Oak and the Willow.

A Conceited Willow had once the vanity to challenge his mighty neighbour the Oak, to a trial of strength. It was to be determined by the next storm; and AEolus was addressed by both parties, to exert his most powerful efforts. This was no sooner asked than granted; and a violent hurricane arose: when the pliant Willow, bending from the blast, or shrinking under it, evaded all its force: while the generous Oak, disdainfully to give way, opposed its fury, and was torn up by the roots. Immediately the Willow began to exult and to claim the victory: when thus the fallen Oak interrupted his exultation. Callest thou this a trial of strength? Poor wretch! not to thy strength, but weakness; not to thy boldly facing danger, but meanly skulking from it, thou owest thy present safety. I am an Oak, though fallen; thou still a Willow, though unhurt: but who, except so mean a wretch as thyself, would prefer an ignominious life, preserved by craft or cowardice, to the glory of meeting death in an honourable cause.

Fable
Ancient Fables. 35

Fable XXXIV.

The Boy and the Filberts.

A certain Boy, as Epictetus tells the fable, put his hand into a pitcher, where great plenty of Figs and Filberts were deposited: he grasped as many as his fist could possibly hold, but when he endeavoured to pull it out, the narrowness of the neck prevented him. Unwilling to lose any of them, but unable to draw out his hand, he burst into tears, and bitterly bemoaned his hard fortune. An honest fellow who stood by, gave him this wise and reasonable advice;—Grasp only half the quantity, my Boy, and you will easily succeed.

Fable XXXV.

The Satyr and the Traveller.

A poor Man travelling in the depth of winter, through a dreary forest, no inn to receive him, no human creature to befriend or comfort him, was in danger of being starved to death. At last however he came to the cave of a Satyr, where he intreated leave to rest a while, and shelter himself from the inclemency of the weather. The Satyr very civilly complied with his request.
request. The Man had no sooner entered, than he began to blow his fingers. His host, surprized at the novelty of the action, was curious to know the meaning of it. I do it, said the Traveller, to warm my frozen joints, which are benumbed with cold. Presently afterwards the Satyr having prepared a mess of hot gruel to refresh his guest, the Man found it necessary to blow his porridge too. What, inquired the Satyr, is not your gruel hot enough? Yes, replied the Traveller, too hot; and I blow it to make it cooler. Do you so? quoth the Satyr, then get out of my cave as fast as you can; for I desire to have no communication with a creature that blows hot and cold with the same breath.

FABLE XXXVI.

The Horse and the Stag.

Before the use of Horses was known in the world, one of these noble animals, having been insulted by a Stag, and finding himself unequal to his adversary, applied to a man for assistance. The request was easily granted, and the man putting a bridle in his mouth, and mounting upon his back, soon came up with the Stag, and laid him dead at his enemy's feet. The Horse having thus gratified his revenge, thanked his his auxiliary: And now will I return in triumph, said he, and reign the undisputed lord of the forest. By no means, replied the man; I shall have occasion for your services, and you must go home with me. So saying, he led him to his hovel, where the unhappy Steed spent the remainder of his days in a laborious servitude; sensible too late, "That how pleasing foever revenge may appear, it always costs more to a generous mind than the purchase is worth."

F A B L E  XXXVII.

The Farmer and his Sons.

A Wealthy old Farmer, who had for some time declined in his health, perceiving that he had not many days to live, called his Sons together to his bedside. My dear Children, said the dying Man, I leave it with you as my last injunction, not to part with the farm which has been in our family these hundred years: for, to disclose to you a secret which I received from my father, and which I now think proper to communicate to you, there is a treasure hid somewhere in the grounds; though I never could discover the particular spot where it lies concealed. However, as soon as the harvest is got in, spare no pains in the search, and I am well assured assured you will not lose your labour. The wise old Man was no sooner laid in his grave, and the time he mentioned arrived, than his Sons went to work, and with great vigour and alacrity, turned up again and again every foot of ground belonging to their farm: the consequence of which was, although they did not find the object of their pursuit, that their lands yielded a far more plentiful crop than those of their neighbours. At the end of the year, when they were settling their accounts, and computing their extraordinary profits, I would venture a wager, said one of the brothers more acute than the rest, that this was the concealed wealth my father meant. I am sure, at least, we have found by experience, that "Industry is itself a treasure."

FABLE XXXVIII.

The Lion and Gnat.

AVAUNT! thou paltry, contemptible insect! said a proud Lion one day to a Gnat that was frisking about in the air near his den. The Gnat, enraged at this unprovoked insult, vowed revenge, and immediately darted into the Lion's ear. After having sufficiently teized him in that quarter, she quitted her station and retired under his belly; and from thence made her her last and most formidable attack in his nostrils, where stinging him almost to madness, the Lion at length fell down, utterly spent with rage, vexation, and pain. The Gnat having thus abundantly gratified her resentment, flew off in great exultation: but in the heedless transports of her success, not sufficiently attending to her own security, she found herself unexpectedly entangled in the web of a spider; who rushing out instantly upon her, put an end to her triumph and her life.

This fable instructs us, never to suffer success so far to transport us, as to throw us off our guard against a reverse of fortune.

FABLE XXXIX.

The Miser and his Treasure.

A Miser having scraped together a considerable sum of money, by denying himself the common conveniencies of life, was much embarrassed where to lodge it most securely. After many perplexing debates with himself, he at length fixed upon a corner in a retired field, where he deposited his Treasure, and with it his heart, in a hole which he dug for that purpose. His mind was now for a moment at ease; but he had not proceeded proceeded many paces in his way home, when all his anxiety returned; and he could not forbear going back to see that every thing was safe. This he repeated again and again; till he was at last observed by a labourer who was mending a hedge in an adjacent meadow. The fellow concluding that something extraordinary must be the occasion of these frequent visits, marked the spot; and coming in the night in order to examine it, he discovered the prize, and bore it off unmolested. Early the next morning, the Miser again renewed his visit; when finding his Treasure gone, he broke out into the most bitter exclamation. A traveller, who happened to be passing by at the same time, was moved by his complaints to enquire into the cause of them. Alas! replied the Miser, I have sustained the most cruel and irreparable loss! Some villain has robbed me of a sum of money, which I buried under this stone no longer ago than yesterday. Buried! returned the traveller with surprize; a very extraordinary method truly of disposing of your riches! Why did you not rather keep them in your house, that they might be ready for your daily occasions? Daily occasions! resumed the Miser, with an air of much indignation; do you imagine I so little know the value of money, as to suffer it to be run away with by occasions? on the contrary, contrary, I had prudently resolved not touch a single shilling of it. If that was your wise resolution, answered the traveller, I see no sort of reason for your being thus afflicted: it is but putting this stone in the place of your Treasure, and it will answer all your purposes full as well.

FABLE XL.

Minerva's Olive.

The gods, say the heathen mythologists, have each of them their favourite tree. Jupiter preferred the Oak, Venus the Myrtle, and Phœbus the Laurel; Cybele the Pine, and Hercules the Poplar. Minerva, continues the mythologists, surprized they should choose barren trees, asked Jupiter the reason.—It is, said he, to prevent any suspicion that we confer the honour we do them, from an interested motive. Let folly suspect what it pleases, returned Minerva; I shall not scruple to acknowledge that I make choice of the Olive for the usefulness of its fruit. O daughter, replied the father of the gods, it is with justice that men esteem thee wise; for nothing is truly valuable that is not useful.
MEN often judge wrong from some foolish prejudice; and whilst they persist in the defence of their mistakes, are sometimes brought to shame by incontestible evidence.

A certain wealthy patrician, intending to treat the Roman people with some theatrical entertainments, published a reward to any one who could furnish a new or uncommon diversion. Excited by emulation, the artists assembled from all parts; among whom, a Mimick, well known for his arch wit, gave out that he had a kind of entertainment that had never yet been produced upon any stage.

This report being spread about, brought the whole city together. The theatre could hardly contain the number of spectators. And when the artist appeared alone upon the stage, without any apparatus, without any prompter or assistant, curiosity and suspense kept the spectators in a profound silence.
On a sudden the performer thrust down his head into his bosom, and mimicked the squeaking of a young pig so naturally, that the audience insisted upon it, he had one under his cloak, and ordered him to be searched. Which being done, and nothing appearing, they loaded the man with encomiums, and honoured him with the most extravagant applause.

A Country fellow observing what passed—“Faith, says he, I can do this better than he:” and immediately gave out that he would perform the same much better the next day. Accordingly, greater crowds assembled: prepossessed however in favour of the first artist, they fit prepared to laugh at the Clown, rather than to judge fairly of his performance.

They both came out upon the stage. The Mimick grunts away first, is received with vast applause, and the loudest acclamations. Then the Countryman pretending that he concealed a little pig under his cloak, (which in fact he did) pinched the ear of the animal, till he made him squeak. The people exclaimed aloud that the first performer had imitated the pig much more naturally, and would have hissed the Countryman off the stage: but he produced the real pig from from his bosom, and convinced them by a visible proof of their ridiculous error; See, Gentlemen, said he, What pretty sort of judges you are!

FABLE XLII.

The Dog and the Crocodile.

We can never be too carefully guarded against a connection with persons of an ill character.

As a Dog was coursing the banks of the Nile, he grew thirsty; but, fearing to be seized by the monsters of that river, he would not stop to satiate his drought, but lapped as he ran. A Crocodile, raising his head above the surface of the water, asked him, Why he was in such a hurry? He had often, he said, wished for his acquaintance, and should be glad to embrace the present opportunity. You do me great honour, said the Dog, but it is to avoid such companions as you, that I am in so much haste.
DESIGNING hypocrites frequently lay themselves open to discovery, by over-acting their parts.

A Wolf who by his frequent visits to a flock of sheep in his neighbourhood, began to be extremely well known to them, thought it expedient, for the more successfully carrying on his depredations, to appear in a new character. To this end he disguised himself in a shepherd’s habit; and resting his fore-feet upon a stick, which served him by way of crook, he softly made his approaches towards the fold. It happened that the shepherd and his dog were both of them extended on the grass, fast asleep; so that he would certainly have succeeded in his project, if he had not imprudently attempted to imitate the shepherd’s voice. The horrid noise awakened them both: when the Wolf, encumbered with his disguise, and finding it impossible either to resist or to flee, yielded up his life an easy prey to the shepherd’s dog.
The Bee and the Spider once entered into a warm debate, which was the better artist. The Spider urged her skill in the mathematics; and asserted that no one was half so well acquainted as herself with the construction of lines, angles, squares, and circles: that the web she daily wove was a specimen of art inimitable by any other creature in the universe: and besides, that her works were derived from herself alone, the product of her own bowels; whereas the boasted honey of the Bee was stolen from every herb and flower of the field; nay, that she had obligations even to the meanest weeds. To this the Bee replied, that she was in hopes the art of extracting honey from the meanest weeds would at least have been allowed her as an excellence; and that as to her stealing sweets from the herbs and flowers of the field, her skill was there so conspicuous, that no flower ever suffered the least diminution of its fragrance from so delicate an operation. Then, as to the Spider's vaunted knowledge in the construction of lines and angles, she believed she might safely rest the merits of her cause, on the regularity alone of her combs; but since she could add add to this, the sweetness and excellence of her honey, and the various purposes to which her wax was employed, she had nothing to fear from a comparison of her skill with that of the weaver of a flimsy cobweb; for the value of every art, she observed, is chiefly to be estimated by its use.

FABLE XLV.

The Ass and his Master.

A diligent Ass, daily loaded beyond his strength by a severe Master, whom he had long served, and who kept him at very short commons, happened one day in his old age to be oppressed with a more than ordinary burthen of earthen-ware. His strength being much impaired, and the road deep and uneven, he unfortunately made a trip, and unable to recover himself, fell down, and broke all the vessels to pieces. His Master transported with rage, began to beat him most unmercifully. Against whom the poor Ass, lifting up his head as he lay on the ground, thus strongly remonstrated: Unfeeling wretch! to thy own avaricious cruelty, in first pinching me of food, and then loading me beyond my strength, thou owest the misfortune which thou so unjustly imputest to me.

FABLE
FABLE XLVI.

The Cock and the Fox.

An experienced old Cock was settling himself to roost upon a high bough, when a Fox appeared under the tree. I am come, said the artful hypocrite, to acquaint you in the name of all my brethren, that a general peace is concluded between your whole family and ours.Descend immediately I beseech you, that we may mutually embrace upon so joyful and unexpected an event. My good friend, replied the Cock, nothing could be more agreeable to me than this news: and to hear it from you increases my satisfaction. But I perceive two hounds at a distance coming this way, who are probably dispatched as couriers with the treaty: as they run very swiftly, and will certainly be here in a few minutes, I will wait their arrival, that we may all four embrace together. Reynard well knew, if that was the case, it was no time for him to remain there any longer: pretending therefore to be in great haste; Adieu, said he, for the present; we will refer our rejoicing to another opportunity: upon which he darted into the woods with all imaginable expedition. Old Chanticleer no sooner saw him depart, than he crowed abundantly in the triumph of his artifice: for by a harmless stratagem to disappoint the malevolent intentions of those who are endeavouring to deceive us to our ruin, is not only innocent, but laudable.

FABLE XLVII.

The Eagle and the Crow.

To mistake our own talents, or over-rate our abilities, is always ridiculous, and sometimes dangerous.

An Eagle, from the top of a high mountain, made a floop at a lamb, pounced it, and bore it away to her young. A Crow, who had built her nest in a cedar near the foot of the rock, observing what passed, was ambitious of performing the same exploit: and darting from her nest, fixed her talons in the fleece of another lamb. But neither able to move her prey, nor disentangle her feet, she was taken by the shepherd, and carried away for his children to play with: who eagerly enquiring what bird it was,—An hour ago, said he, she fancied herself an Eagle; however, I suppose she is by this time convinced that she is but a Crow.
 ANCIENT FABLES.

FABLE XLVIII.

The Farmer and the Stag.

A Stag, who had left at some distance a pack of hounds, came up to a Farmer, and desired he would suffer him to hide himself in a little coppice which joined to his house. The Farmer, on condition that he would forbear to enter a field of wheat, which lay before him, and was now ready for the sickle, immediately gave him leave, and promised not to betray him. The squire with his train instantly appeared, and enquired whether he had not seen the Stag; No, said the Farmer, he has not passed this way, I assure you: but, in order to curry favour at the same time with his worship, he pointed silly with his finger to the place where the poor beast lay concealed. This however, the sportsman, intent on his game, did not observe, but passed on with his dogs across the very field. As soon as the Stag perceived they were gone, he prepared to steal off, without speaking a word. Methinks, cryed the Farmer, you might thank me, at least, for the refuge I have afforded you: yes, said the Stag, and had your hands been as honest as your tongue, I certainly should; but all the return that a double dealer has to expect, is a just indignation and contempt.

FABLE XLIX.

The Lion, the Tyger, and the Fox.

A Lion and a Tyger jointly seized on a young fawn, which they immediately killed. This they had no sooner performed, than they fell a fighting, in order to decide whose property it should be. The battle was so bloody, and so obstinate, that they were both compelled, thro' weariness and loss of blood, to desist; and lye down by mutual consent, totally disabled. At this instant, a Fox unluckily came by; who, perceiving their situation, made bold to seize the contested prey, and bore it off unmolested. As soon as the Lion could recover breath—How foolish, said he, has been our conduct! Instead of being contented as we ought, with our respective shares; our senseless rage has rendered us unable to prevent this rascally Fox from defrauding us of the whole.
ANCIENT FABLES.

FABLE L.

The Lion and the Ass.

A conceited Ass had once the impertinence to bray forth some contemptuous speeches against the Lion. The suddenness of the insult, at first raised some emotions of wrath in his breast; but turning his head and perceiving from whence it came, they immediately subsided; and he very sedately walked on, without deigning to honour the contemptible creature, even so much as with an angry word.

FABLE LI.

The Snake and the Hedge-hog.

It is by no means prudent to join interests with such as have it in their power to impose upon us their own conditions.

By the intreaties of a Hedge-hog half starved with cold, a Snake was once persuaded to receive him into her cell. He was no sooner entered, than his prickles began to be very uneasy to his companion: upon which, the Snake desired he would provide himself another lodging, as she found her apartment was not large enough to to accommodate both. Nay, said the Hedge-hog, let them that are uneasy in their situation exchange it; for my own part, I am very well contented where I am; and if you are not, you are welcome to remove whenever you think proper.

FABLE LII.

The Trumpeter.

A Trumpeter in a certain army, happened to be taken prisoner. He was ordered immediately to execution, but pleaded in excuse for himself, that it was unjust a person should suffer death, who, far from an intention of mischief, did not even wear an offensive weapon. So much the rather, replied one of the enemy, shalt thou die; since without any design of fighting thyself, thou excitest others to the bloody business: for he that is the abettor of a bad action, is at least equally guilty with him that commits it.
F O R T U N E and Vice, according to Plutarch had once a violent contest, which of them had it most in their power to make mankind unhappy. Fortune boasted that she could take from men every external good; and bring upon them every external evil. Be it so, replied Vice; but this is by no means sufficient to make them miserable without my assistance: whereas without yours, I am able to render them completely so; nay, in spite too of all your endeavours to make them happy.

F A B L E L I V.

The Bear and the Bees.

A Bear happened to be stung by a Bee; the pain was so acute, that in the madness of revenge he ran into the garden, and overturned the hive, vowing the destruction of the whole race. This outrage provoked their anger to a high degree, and brought the fury of the whole swarm upon him. They attacked him with such violence, that his life was in danger, and it was with the utmost difficulty that he made his escape, wounded from head to tail. In this desperate condition, lamenting his misfortune, and licking his sores, he could not forbear reflecting, how much more advisable it had been to have patiently acquiesced under one injury, than thus by an unprofitable resentment to have provoked a thousand.

This fable is abridged from Plutarch, by Lord Bolingbroke, in his Philosophical Tracts.
FABLES.

BOOK II.

FROM THE MODERNS.

FABLE I.

The Miller, his Son, and their Afs.

A Miller and his Son were driving their Afs to market, in order to sell him: and that he might get thither fresh and in good condition, they drove him on gently before them. They had not gone far, when they met a company of travellers. Sure, say they, you are mighty careful of your Afs: methinks one of you might as well get up and ride, as suffer him to walk on at his ease, while you trudge after him on foot. In compliance with this advice, the Old Man set his Son upon the beast. They had scarce advanced a quarter of a mile further, when they they met another company. You idle young rogue, said one of the party, why don't you get down, and let your poor father ride? Upon this, the Old Man made his Son dismount, and got up himself. While they were marching in this manner, a third company began to insult the father. You hard-hearted, unnatural wretch, say they, how can you suffer that poor lad to wade through the dirt, while you like an alderman ride at your ease? The good-natured Miller stood corrected, and immediately took his Son up behind him. And now, the next man they met exclaimed with more vehemence, than all the rest. Was there ever such a couple of lazy boobies? to overload in so unconscionable a manner, a poor dumb creature, who is far less able to carry them than they are to carry him! The complying Old Man would have been half inclined to make the trial, had not experience by this time sufficiently convinced him, that there cannot be a more fruitless attempt, than to endeavour to please all mankind.

FABLE
MODERN FABLES.  61

FABLE II.

The Sorceress.

Night and silence had now given repose to the whole world; when an old ill-natured Sorceress, in order to exercise her infernal arts, entered into a gloomy wood, that trembled at her approach. The scene of her horrid incantations was within the circumference of a large circle; in the center of which an altar was raised, where the hallowed vervain blazed in triangular flames, while the mischievous Hag pronounced the dreadful words, which bound all hell in obedience to her charms. She blows a raging pestilence from her lips into the neighbouring folds; the innocent cattle die, to afford a fit sacrifice to the infernal deities. The moon, by powerful spells drawn down from her orb, enters the wood: legions of spirits from Pluto's realms appear before the altar, and demand her pleasure. Tell me, said she, where I shall find what I have lost, my favourite little dog. How! cried they all, enraged—Impertinent Beldame! must the order of nature be inverted, and the repose of every creature disturbed, for the sake of thy little dog?
FABLE III.

The Camelion.

Two travellers happened on their journey to be engaged in a warm dispute about the colour of the Camelion. One of them affirmed it was blue; that he had seen it with his own eyes, upon the naked branch of a tree, feeding on the air, in a very clear day. The other strongly asserted it was green, and that he had viewed it very closely and minutely on the broad leaf of a fig-tree. Both of them were positive, and the dispute was rising to a quarrel: but a third person luckily coming by, they agreed to refer the question to his decision. Gentlemen, said the arbitrator with a smile of great self-satisfaction, you could not have been more lucky in your reference, as I happen to have caught one of them last night: but indeed you are both mistaken, for the creature is totally black. Black! impossible! Nay, quoth the umpire, with great assurance; the matter may soon be decided, for I immediately enclosed my Camelion in a little paper box, and here it is. So saying, he drew it out of his pocket, opened his box, and behold, it was as white as snow. The positive disputants looked equally surprized, and equally confounded: while the the sagacious reptile, assuming the air of a philosopher, thus admonished them: Ye children of men, learn diffidence and moderation in your opinions. 'Tis true, you happen, in this present instance, to be all in the right, and have only considered the subject under different circumstances: but pray, for the future, allow others to have eye-sight as well as yourselves; nor wonder if every one prefers the testimony of his own senses, to that of another's.

FABLE IV.

The Wolf and the Lamb.

A Flock of sheep were feeding in a meadow, while their dogs were asleep, and their shepherd at a distance, playing on his pipe, beneath the shade of a spreading elm. A young unexperienced Lamb, observing a half-starved Wolf peeping through the pales of the enclosure, entered into conversation with him. Pray, what are you seeking for here? said the Lamb. I am looking, replied the Wolf, for some tender grass; for nothing you know is more pleasant than to feed in a fresh pasture, and to slake ones thirst at a crystal stream: both which, I perceive, you enjoy within these pales in their utmost perfection. Happy creature! continued he, how much
I envy your lot! who are in full possession of the utmost I desire: for philosophy has long taught me to be satisfied with a little. It seems then, returned the Lamb, those who say you feed on flesh, accuse you falsely, since a little grass will easily content you. If this be true, let us for the future live like brethren, and feed together. So saying, the simple Lamb imprudently crept through the fence, and became at once a prey to our pretended philosopher, and a sacrifice to his own inexperience and credulity.

FABLE V.

The Fox and the Bramble.

A Fox closely pursued by a pack of dogs, took shelter under the covert of a Bramble. He rejoiced in this asylum, and for a while was very happy: but soon found, that if he attempted to stir, he was wounded by thorns and prickers on every side. However, making a virtue of necessity, he forbore to complain; and comforted himself with reflecting, that no bliss is perfect; that good and evil are mixt, and flow from the same fountain. These briars indeed, said he, will tear my skin a little, yet they keep off the dogs. For the sake of the good then, let me bear the evil with patience; each bitter has its sweets, and these these Brambles though they wound my flesh, preserve my life from danger.

FABLE VI.

The Falcon and the Hen.

DIFFERENT circumstances make the same action right or wrong, a virtue or a vice.

Of all the creatures I ever knew, said a Falcon to a Hen, you are certainly the most ungrateful. What instance of ingratitude, replied the Hen, can you justly charge upon me? The greatest, returned the Falcon; ingratitude to your highest benefactors, men. Do they not feed you every day, and shelter you every night? Nevertheless, when they endeavour to court you to them, you ungratefully forget all their kindness, and fly from them as from an enemy. Now I, who am wild by nature, and no way obliged to them; yet upon the least of their carelesse, suffer myself to be taken, and go, or come at their command. All this is very true, replied the Hen, but there may be a sufficient reason both for my fear, and for your familiarity: I believe you never saw a single Falcon roasting at the fire; whereas I have seen an hundred Hens trussed for that purpose.

F

FABLE
The Travellers and the Money-bag.

As two men were travelling on the road, one of them espied a bag of Money lying on the ground, and picking it up, I am in luck this morning, said he, I have found a Bag of Money. Yes, returned the other; though, methinks, you should not say I, but We have found it: for when two friends are travelling together, they ought equally to share in any accidental good fortune that may happen to attend them. No, rejoined the former, it was I that found it, and I must insist upon keeping it. He had no sooner spoken the words than they were alarmed with a hue and cry after a thief, who had that morning taken a purse upon the road. Lord, says the finder, this is extremely unfortunate, we shall certainly be seized. Good Sir, replied the other, be pleased not to say We, but I: as you would not allow me a share in the prize, you have no right to make me a partner in the punishment.
FABLE VIII.

The discontented Aes.

In the depth of winter, a poor Aes prayed heartily for the spring, that he might exchange a cold lodging, and a heartless truss of straw, for a little warm weather and a mouthful of fresh grass. In a short time, according to his wish, the warm weather, and the fresh grass came on; but brought with them so much toil and business, that he was soon as weary of the spring as before of the winter; and he now became impatient for the approach of summer. Summer arrives: but the heat, the harvest-work, and other drudgeries and inconveniences of the season, set him as far from happiness as before; which he now flattered himself would be found in the plenty of autumn. But here too he is disappointed; for what with the carrying of apples, roots, fewel for the winter, and other provisions, he was in autumn more fatigued than ever. Having thus trod round the circle of the year, in a course of restless labour, uneasiness and disappointment; and found no season, nor station of life, without its business and its trouble; he was forced at last to acquiesce in the comfortless season of winter, where his complaint began:
began: convinced that in this world, every situation has its inconvenience.

FABLE IX.

The two Springs.

TWO Springs, which issued from the same fountain, began their course together: one of them took her way in a silent and gentle stream, while the other rushed along with a sounding and rapid current. Sisiter, said the latter, at the rate you move, you will probably be dried up before you advance much farther: whereas, for myself, I will venture a wager, that within two or three hundred furlongs I shall become navigable, and after distributing commerce and wealth wherever I flow, I shall majestically proceed to pay my tribute to the ocean: so farewell, dear sister, and patiently submit to your fate. Her sister made no reply; but calmly descending to the meadows below, increased her stream by numberless little rills, which she collected in her progress, till at length she was enabled to rise into a considerable river: whilst the proud Stream, who had the vanity to depend solely upon her own sufficiency, continued a shallow brook, and was glad at last to be helped forward, by throwing herself into the arms of her despised sister.

FABLE
A Fine powdered Butterfly fell in love with a beautiful Rose, who expanded her charms in a neighbouring parterre. Matters were soon adjusted between them, and they mutually vowed eternal fidelity. The Butterfly, perfectly satisfied with the success of his amour, took a tender leave of his mistress, and did not return again till noon. What! said the Rose, when she saw him approach, is the ardent passion you vowed, so soon extinguished? It is an age since you paid me a visit. But no wonder: for I observed you courting by turns every flower in the garden. You little coquet, replied the Butterfly, it well becomes you truely, to reproach me with my gallantries; when in fact I only copy the example which you yourself have set me. For, not to mention the satisfaction with which you admitted the kiss of the fragrant Zephyr; did I not see you displaying your charms to the bee, the fly, the wasp, and in short, encouraging and receiving the addresses of every buzzing insect that fluttered within your view? If you will be a coquet, you must expect to find me inconstant.
FABLE XI.

The Tortoise and two Ducks.

Vanity and idle curiosity are qualities which generally prove destructive to those who suffer themselves to be governed by them.

A Tortoise, weary of passing her days in the same obscure corner, conceived a wonderful inclination to visit foreign countries. Two Ducks, whom the simple Tortoise acquainted with her intention, undertook to oblige her upon the occasion. Accordingly they told her, that if she would fasten her mouth to the middle of a pole, they would take the two ends, and transport her whithersoever she chose to be conveyed. The Tortoise approved of the expedient; and every thing being prepared, the Ducks began their flight with her. They had not travelled far in the air, when they were met by a crow, who enquiring what they were bearing along, they replied, The queen of the Tortoises. The Tortoise, vain of the new and unmerited appellation, was going to confirm the title, when opening her mouth for that purpose, she let go her hold, and was dashed to pieces by her fall.
MODERN FABLES.

FABLE XII.

The Cat and the old Rat.

A certain Cat had made such unmerciful havoc among the vermin of her neighbourhood, that not a single Rat or Mouse dared venture to appear abroad. Puss was soon convinced, that if affairs remained in their present situation, she must be totally unsupplied with provision. After mature deliberation therefore, she resolved to have recourse to stratagem. For this purpose, she suspended herself from a hook with her head downwards, pretending to be dead. The rats and mice observing her, as they peeped from their holes, in this dangling attitude, concluded she was hanged for some misdemeanour; and with great joy immediately sallied forth in quest of their prey. Puss, as soon as a sufficient number were collected together, quitting her hold, dropped into the midst of them; and very few had the fortune to make good their retreat. This artifice having succeeded so well, she was encouraged to try the event of a second. Accordingly she whitened her coat all over, by rolling herself in a heap of flour, and in this disguise lay concealed in the bottom of a meal tub. This stratagem was executed, in general, with the same effect.
effect as the former. But an old experienced Rat, altogether as cunning as his adversary, was not so easily ensnared. I don't much like, said he, that white heap yonder; something whispers me, there is mischief concealed under it.
'Tis true, it may be meal; but it may likewise be something that I shall not relish quite so well.
There can be no harm, at least, in keeping at a proper distance: for caution, I am sure, is the parent of security.

FABLE XIII.

The Country Maid and her Milk-pail

When men suffer their imaginations to amuse them with the prospect of distant and uncertain improvements of their condition; they frequently sustain real losses, by their inatten-tion to those affairs in which they are immediately concerned.

A Country Maid was walking very deliberarately with a Pail of Milk upon her head, when she fell into the following train of reflections.
The money, for which I shall sell this Milk, will enable me to increase my flock of eggs to three hundred. These eggs, allowing for what may prove addle, and what may be destroyed by vermin,
min, will produce at least, two hundred and fifty chickens. The chickens will be fit to carry to market about Christmas, when poultry always bear a good price: so that by May-day, I cannot fail of having money enough to purchase a new gown. Green—let me consider,—yes, green becomes my complexion best, and green it shall be. In this dress I will go to the fair, where all the young fellows will strive to have me for a partner: but I shall perhaps refuse every one of them, and with an air of disdain tos from them—Transported with this triumphant thought, she could not forbear acting with her head, what thus passed in her imagination; when down came the Pail of Milk, and all her imaginary happiness vanished in a moment.

FABLE XIV.

The Cormorant and the Fishes.

It is very imprudent to trust an enemy, or even a stranger, so far as to put one's self in his power.

A Cormorant whose eyes were become so dim by age, that he could not discern his prey at the bottom of the waters, bethought himself of a stratagem to supply his wants. Hark you, friend, said said he to a Gudgeon, whom he observed swimming near the surface of a certain canal, if you have any regard for yourself or your brethren, go this moment and acquaint them from me, that the owner of this piece of water is determined to drag it a week hence. The Gudgeon immediately swam away, and made his report of this terrible news to a general assembly of the Fishes; who unanimously agreed to send him back as their ambassador to the Cormorant. The purport of his commission was to return him their thanks for the intelligence; and to add their intreaties, that, as he had been so good as to inform them of their danger, he would be graciously pleased to put them into a method of escaping it. That I will most readily, returned the artful Cormorant, and assist you with my best services into the bargain. You have only to collect yourselves together at the top of the water, and I will undertake to transport you one by one to my own residence, by the side of a solitary pool, to which no creature but myself ever found the way. The project was perfectly well approved by the unwary Fishes, and with great expedition performed by the deceitful Cormorant; who having placed them in a shallow water, the bottom of which his eye could easily discern, they they were all devoured by him in their turns, as his hunger or luxury required.

Fable XV.

The Atheist and the Acorn.

It was the fool who said in his heart, There is no God: into the breast of a wise man, such a thought could never have entered. One of those refined Reasoners, commonly called Minute Philosophers, was sitting at his ease beneath the shade of a large oak, while at his side the weak branches of a pumice were trailed upon the ground. This threw our great logician into his old track of reasoning against providence. Is it consistent with common sense, said he, that infinite wisdom should create so large and stately a tree, with branches of such prodigious strength, only to bear so small and insignificant a fruit as an Acorn? Or that so weak a stem, as that of a pumice, should be loaded with so dispropor- tioned a weight? A child may see the absurdity of it. In the midst of this curious speculation, down dropped an Acorn, from one of the highest branches of the oak, full upon his head. How small a trifle may overturn the systems of mighty philosophers! Struck with the accident, he could not not help crying out, How providential it is that this was not a pumppion!

FABLE XVI.

The Lynx and the Mole.

Under the covert of a thick wood, at the foot of a tree, as a Lynx lay whetting his teeth, and waiting for his prey; he espied a Mole, half buried under a hilloc of her own raising. Alas, poor creature, said the Lynx, how much I pity thee! Surely Jupiter has been very unkind, to debar thee from the light of the day, which rejoices the whole creation. Thou art certainly not above half alive; and it would be doing thee a service, to put an end to so unanimated a being. I thank you for your kindness, replied the Mole, but I think I have full as much vivacity, as my state and circumstances require. For the rest, I am perfectly well contented with the faculties which Jupiter has allotted me, who I am sure wants not our direction in distributing his gifts with propriety. I have not, 'tis true, your piercing eyes; but I have ears which answer all my purposes full as well. Hark! for example, I am warned, by a noife which I hear behind you, to fly from danger. So saying, he flunk into the earth; while a javelin from the arm of a hunter, pierced the quick-sighted Lynx to the heart.

FABLE XVII.

The Spider and the Silk-worm.

Those arts are most valuable, which are of greatest use.

A Spider, busied in spreading his web from one side of a room to the other, was asked by an industrious Silk-worm, to what end he spent so much time and labour, in making such a number of lines and circles? The Spider angrily replied, Do not disturb me, thou ignorant thing: I transmit my ingenuity to posterity, and fame is the object of my wishes. Just as he had spoken, Susan the chambermaid, coming into the room to feed her Silk-worms, saw the spider at his work; and with one stroke of her broom, swept him away, and destroyed at once his labours, and hopes of fame.
A Bee observing a Fly frisking about her hive, asked him in a very passionate tone, what he did there? Is it for such scoundrels as you, said she, to intrude into the company of the queens of the air? You have great reason truly, replied the Fly, to be out of humour: I am sure they must be mad, who would have any concern with so quarrelsome a nation. And why so? thou saucy malapert, returned the enraged Bee: we have the best laws, and are governed by the best policy in the world. We feed upon the most fragrant flowers, and all our business is to make honey? honey, which equals nectar, thou tasteless wretch, who livest upon nothing but putrefaction and excrement. We live as we can, rejoined the Fly: poverty, I hope, is no crime; but passion is one, I am sure. The honey you make, is sweet I grant you; but your heart is all bitterness: for to be revenged on an enemy, you'll destroy your own life; and are so inconsiderate in your rage, as to do more mischief to yourself, than to your adversary. Take my word for it, one had better have less considerable talents, and use them with more discretion.

FABLE
MODERN FABLES. 79

FABLE XIX.

Genius, Virtue, and Reputation.

GENIUS, Virtue, and Reputation, three intimate friends, agreed to travel over the island of Great Breton, to see whatever might be worthy of observation. But as some misfortune, said they, may happen to separate us; let us consider before we set out, by what means we may find each other again. Should it be my ill fate, said Genius, to be severed from my friends, which heaven forbid! you may find me kneeling in devotion before the tomb of Shakespear; or rapt in some grove where Milton talked with angels; or musing in the grotto where Pope caught inspiration. Virtue, with a sigh, acknowledged that her friends were not very numerous: but were I to lose you, she cried, with whom I am at present so happily united; I should choose to take sanctuary in the temples of religion, in the palaces of royalty, or in the stately domes of ministers of state: but as it may be my ill fortune to be there denied admittance, enquire for some cottage where Contentment has a bower, and there you will certainly find me. Ah, my dear companions, said Reputation very earnestly, you I perceive, when missing, may possibly be be recovered; but take care, I intreat you, always to keep sight of me, for if I am once lost, I am never to be retrieved.

F A B L E XX.

_The Court of Death._

D E A T H, the king of terrors, on the anniversary of his coronation, was determined to choose his prime minister. His pale courtiers, the ghastly train of diseases, were all summoned to attend: when each preferred his claim to the honour of this illustrious office. Fever urged the numbers he destroyed; cold Palsy set forth his pretensions, by shaking all his limbs; and Dropfy, by his swelled unwieldy carcass. Gout hobbled up, and allledged his great power in racking every joint; and Asthma's inability to speak, was a strong, though silent argument in favour of his claim. Stone and Cholic pleaded their violence; Plague, his rapid progress in destruction; and Consumption tho' flow, insisted that he was sure. In the midst of this contention, the court was disturbed with the noise of music, dancing, feasting, and revelry; when immediately entered a lady with a bold lascivious air, and a flushed and jovial countenance: she was attended on one hand by a troop of cooks and bacchanals;
13 Country Maid and her Milk.
14 Cormorant and Fishes.
15 The Atheist and the Acorn.
16 The Lynx and the Mole.
17 The Spider & Silkworm.
18 The Bee and Fly.
19 Genius, Virtue & Reputation.
20 The Court of Death.
21 Industry and Sloth.
22 The Hares Ears.
23 The Hermit and the Bear.
24 The Passenger & Pilot.
bacchanals; and on the other by a train of wanton youths and damsels, who danced half naked to the softest musical instruments; her name was Intemperance. She waved her hand, and thus addressed the crowd of Diseases. Give way, ye sickly band of pretenders, nor dare to vie with my superior merits in the service of this great Monarch. Am not I your parent? the author of your beings? Do you not derive your power of shortening human life almost wholly from me? Who then so fit as myself for this important office? The grisly Monarch grinned a smile of approbation, placed her at his right hand, and she immediately became his prime favourite, and principal minister.

FABLE XXI.

Industry and Sloth.

How many live in the world as useless, as if they had never been born! They pass through life, like a bird through the air, and leave no track behind them: waste the prime of their days in deliberating what they shall do; and bringing them to a period, without coming to any determination.
An indolent young man, being asked why he lay in bed so long, jocosely and carelessly answered—Every morning of my life I am hearing causes, I have two fine girls, their names are Industry and Sloth, close at my bed side, as soon as ever I awake, pressing their different suits. One intreats me to get up, the other persuade me to lie still: and then they alternately give me various reasons, why I should rise, and why I should not. This detains me so long, as it is the duty of an impartial judge to hear all that can be said on either side, that before the pleadings are over, it is time to go to dinner.

F A B L E  X X I I.

The Hare's Ears.

An Elk having accidentally gored a Lion, the monarch was so exasperated, that he sent forth an edict, commanding all horned beasts, on pain of death, to depart his dominions. A Hare observing the shadow of her Ears, was much alarmed at their long and lofty appearance; and running to one of her friends, acquainted him that she was resolved to quit the country. For should I happen, said she, however undesignedly, to give offence to my superiors, my Ears may be construed to come within the horn-act. Her Her friend smiled at her apprehensions: and asked, how it was possible that Ears could be mistaken for horns? Had I no more Ears than an ostrich, replied the Hare, I would not trust them in the hands of an informer: for truth and innocence are arguments of little force, against the logic of power and malice in conjunction.

FABLE XXIII.

The Hermit and the Bear.

An imprudent friend often does as much mischief by his too great zeal, as the worst enemy could effect by his malice.

A certain Hermit having done a good office to a Bear, the grateful creature was so sensible of his obligation, that he begged to be admitted as the guardian and companion of his solitude. The Hermit willingly accepted his offer; and conducted him to his cell, where they passed their time together in an amicable manner. One very hot day, the Hermit having laid him down to sleep, the officious Bear employed himself in driving away the flies from his patron's face. But in spite of all his care, one of the flies perpetually returned to the attack, and at last, settled upon the Hermit's nose. Now I shall have you most certainly, certainly, said the Bear; and with the best intentions imaginable, gave him a violent blow on the face; which very effectually indeed demolished the fly, but at the same time most terribly bruised the face of his benefactor.

FABLE XXIV.

The Passenger and the Pilot.

IT had blown a violent storm at sea, and the whole crew of a vessel were in imminent danger of shipwreck. After the rolling of the waves was somewhat abated, a certain Passenger who had never been at sea before, observing the Pilot to have appeared wholly unconcerned, even in their greatest danger, had the curiosity to ask him what death his father died. What death? said the Pilot; why he perished at sea, as my grandfather did before him. And are not you afraid of trusting yourself to an element that has proved thus fatal to your family? Afraid! by no means; why, we must all die: is not your father dead? Yes, but he died in his bed. And why then are not you afraid of trusting yourself to your bed? Because I am there perfectly secure. It may be so, replied the Pilot; but if the hand of providence is equally extended over all places, there is no more reason for me to be afraid afraid of going to sea, than for you to be afraid of going to bed.

FABLE XXV.

The partial Judge.

A Farmer came to a neighbouring Lawyer, expressing great concern for an accident which he said had just happened. One of your oxen, continued he, has been gored by an unlucky bull of mine, and I should be glad to know how I am to make you reparation. Thou art a very honest fellow, replied the Lawyer, and wilt not think it unreasonable, that I expect one of thy oxen in return. It is no more than justice, quoth the Farmer, to be sure: but what did I say?—I mistake—It is your bull that has killed one of my oxen. Indeed! says the Lawyer, that alters the case: I must enquire into the affair; and if—And if! said the Farmer—the business I find would have been concluded without an if; had you been as ready to do justice to others, as to exact it from them.
FABLE XXVI.

The Fox that had lost his Tail.

A Fox having been unwarily caught in a trap, with much struggling and difficulty, at length disengaged himself; not however without being obliged to leave his Tail behind him. The joy he felt at his escape, was somewhat abated when he began to consider the price he had paid for it: and he was a good deal mortified by reflecting on the ridiculous figure he should make among his brethren, without a Tail. In the agitation of his thoughts upon this occasion, an expedient occurred to him, which he resolved to try, in order to remove this disgraceful singularity. With this view he assembled his tribe together, and set forth in a most elaborate speech, how much he had at heart, whatever tended to the public weal: he had often thought, he said, on the length and busiwhiness of their Tails; was verily persuaded that it was much more burthensome, than ornamental, and rendered them besides an easier prey to their enemies. He earnestly recommended it to them, therefore, to discharge themselves of so useless and dangerous an incumbrance. My good friend, replied an old Fox, who had listened very attentively to his his harangue, we are much obliged to you, no doubt, for the concern you express upon our account: but pray turn about before the company, for I cannot, for my life, help suspecting, that you would not be quite so solicitous to ease us of our Tails, if you had not unluckily lost your own.

FABLE XXVII.

The Nobleman and his Son.

A Certain Nobleman, much infected by superfition, dreamed one night that his only Son, a youth about fifteen years of age, was thrown from his horse as he was hunting, and killed upon the spot. This idle dream made so strong an impression upon the weak and credu-lous father, that he formed a resolution never more to suffer his Son to partake of this his favourite diversion. The next morning that the hounds went out, the young man requested permission to follow them; but instead of receiving it, as usual, his father acquainted him with his dream, and peremptorily enjoined him to forbear the sport. The youth, greatly mortified at this unexpected refusal, left the room much disconcerted, and it was with some difficulty that he restrained his passion from indecently breaking out in his father's presence. But upon his return return to his own apartment, passing through a gallery of pictures, in which was a piece representing a company of gypsies telling a country girl her fortune.—'Tis owing, said he, to a ridiculous superstition of the same kind, with that of this simple wench, that I am debarred from one of the principal pleasures of my life: at the same time, with great emotion, he struck his hand against the canvas; when a rusty old nail, behind the picture, ran far into his wrist. The pain and anguish of the wound threw the youth into a violent fever, which proved too powerful for the skill of the physicians, and in a few days put an end to his life: illustrating an observation, that an over-cautious attention to avoid evils, often brings them upon us; and that we are frequently thrown headlong into misfortunes, by the very means we make use of to avoid them.

F A B L E  XXVIII.

Jupiter and the Herdsman.

A Herdsman missed a young heifer out of his grounds, and, after having diligently sought for it in vain, when he could by no other means gain intelligence of it, betook himself at last to his prayers. Great Jupiter, said he, shew me but the villain who has done me this injury, and

I
I will give thee in sacrifice the finest kid from my flock. He had no sooner uttered his petition, than turning the corner of a wood, he was struck with the sight of a monstrous lion, preying on the carcass of his heifer. Trembling and pale, O Jupiter, cried he, I offered thee a kid if thou wouldst grant my petition: I now offer thee a bull, if thou wilt deliver me from the consequence of it.

F A B L E XXIX.

The Eagle and the Owl.

An Eagle and an Owl having entered into a league of mutual amity, one of the articles of their treaty was, that the former should not prey upon the younglings of the latter. But tell me, said the Owl, should you know my little ones, if you were to see them? Indeed I should not, replied the Eagle; but if you describe them to me, it will be sufficient. You are to observe then, returned the Owl, in the first place, that the charming creatures are perfectly well-shaped; in the next, that there is a remarkable sweetness and vivacity in their countenances; and then there is something in their voices so peculiarly melodious—"Tis enough, interrupted the Eagle; by these marks I cannot fail of distinguishing them:
them: and you may depend upon their never receiving any injury from me. It happened not long afterwards, as the Eagle was upon the wing in quest of his prey, that he discovered amidst the ruins of an old castle, a nest of grim-faced, ugly birds, with gloomy countenances, and a voice like that of the furies. These undoubtedly, said he, cannot be the offspring of my friend, and so I shall venture to make free with them. He had scarce finished his repast and departed, when the Owl returned; who, finding nothing of her brood remaining but some fragments of the mangled carcases, broke out into the most bitter exclamations against the cruel and perfidious author of her calamity. A neighbouring bat, who over-heard her lamentations, and had been witness to what had passed between her and the Eagle; very gravely told her, that she had nobody to blame for this misfortune, but herself: whose blind prejudices in favour of her children, had prompted her to give such a description of them, as did not resemble them in any one single feature or quality.

Parents should very carefully guard against that weak partiality towards their children, which renders them blind to their failings and imper-sections: as no disposition is more likely to prove prejudicial to their future welfare.

FABLE XXX.

The Plague among the Beasts.

A mortal distemper once raged among the Beasts, and swept away prodigious numbers. After it had continued some time without abatement, it was concluded in an assembly of the brute creation to be a judgment inflicted upon them for their sins, and a day was appointed for a general confession; when it was agreed, that he who appeared to be the greatest sinner, should suffer death, as an atonement for the rest.

The Fox was appointed father confessor upon the occasion; and the Lion with great generosity, condescended to be the first in making public confession. For my part, said he, I must own I have been an enormous offender; I have killed many innocent sheep in my time; nay once, but it was a case of necessity, I made a meal of the shepherd. The Fox, with much gravity, acknowledged, that these in any other than the King, would have been inexpiable crimes; but that his majesty had certainly a right to a few silly sheep, nay, and to the shepherd too, in case of necessity. The judgment of the Fox was applauded by by all the superior savages; and the Tyger, the Leopard, the Bear, and the Wolf, made confession of many enormities of the like sanguinary nature: which were all palliated or excused with the same lenity and mercy; and their crimes accounted so venial, as scarce to deserve the name of offences. At last, a poor penitent Ass, with great contrition acknowledged, that once going through the parson's meadow, being very hungry, and tempted by the sweetness of the grass, he had cropt a little of it, not more however in quantity, than the tip of his tongue: he was very sorry for the misdemeanour, and hoped—Hope! exclaimed the Fox with singular zeal, what canst thou hope for, after the commission of so heinous a crime? What! eat the parson's grass! O sacrilege! This, this is the flagrant wickedness, my brethren, which has drawn the wrath of heaven upon our heads, and this the notorious offender, whose death must make atonement for all our transgressions. So saying, he ordered his entrails for sacrifice, and the rest of the Beasts went to dinner upon his carcase.
A Young Mouse, who had seen very little of the world, came running one day to his mother in great haste—O mother, said he, I am frightened almost to death! I have seen the most extraordinary creature that ever was. He has a fierce angry look, and struts about upon two legs. A strange piece of flesh grows upon his head, and another under his throat, as red as blood. He flapped his arms against his sides, as if he intended to rise into the air; and stretching out his head, he opened a sharp-pointed mouth so wide, that I thought he was preparing to swallow me up: then he roared at me so horribly, that I trembled every joint, and was glad to run home as fast as I could. If I had not been frightened away by this terrible monster, I was just going to scrape acquaintance with the prettiest creature you ever saw. She had a soft fur skin, thicker than ours, and all beautifully streaked with black and grey; with a modest look, and a demeanour so humble and courteous, that me-thought I could have fallen in love with her. Then she had a fine long tail, which she waved about so prettily, and looked so earnestly at me, that I
I do believe she was just going to speak to me, when the horrid monster frightened me away. Ah, my dear child, said the mother, you have escaped being devoured, but not by that monster you were so much afraid of: which in truth was only a bird, and would have done you no manner of harm. Whereas the sweet creature, of whom you seem so fond, was no other, than a Cat; who, under that hypocritical countenance, conceals the most inveterate hatred to all our race, and subsists entirely by devouring Mice. Learn from this incident, my dear, never whilst you live to rely on outward appearances.

FABLE XXXII.

The Farmer and his Dog.

A Farmer who had just stepped into his field to mend a gap in one of his fences, found at his return, the cradle, where he had left his only child asleep, turned upside down, the clothes all torn and bloody, and his Dog lying near it besmeared also with blood. Immediately conceiving that the creature had destroyed his child, he instantly dashed out his brains with the hatchet in his hand: when turning up the cradle, he found his child unhurt, and an enormous serpent lying dead on the floor, killed by that faithful Dog, Dog, whose courage and fidelity in preserving the life of his son, deserved another kind of reward. These affecting circumstances afforded him a striking lesson, how dangerous it is too hastily to give way to the blind impulse of a sudden passion.

FABLE XXXIII.

The Gnat and the Bee.

A Gnat half starved with cold, and pinched with hunger, came early one morning to a Bee-hive, begging the relief of charity, and offered to teach music in the family, on the humble terms of diet and lodging. The Bee received her petitioner with a cold civility, and desired to be excused. I bring up all my children, said she, to my own usual trade, that they may be able when they grow up, to get an honest livelihood by their industry. Besides, how do you think I could be so imprudent as to teach them an art, which I see has reduced its Professor to indigence and beggary?
FABLE XXXIV.

The Owl and the Eagle.

An Owl, late blinking in the trunk of a hollow tree, and arraigned the brightness of the sun. What is the use of its beams, said she, but to dazzle one's eyes so that one cannot see a mouse? For my part, I am at a loss to conceive for what purpose so glaring an object was created. We had certainly been much better without it. O fool! replied an Eagle perched on a branch of the same tree, to rail at excellence which thou canst not taste; and not to perceive that the fault is not in the sun, but in thyself. All, 'tis true, have not faculties to understand, or powers to enjoy the benefit of it; but must the business and the pleasures of the world be obstructed, that an Owl may catch mice?

FABLE XXXV.

The sick Lion, the Fox, and the Wolf.

A Lion, having forfeited himself with feasting too luxurious on the carcase of a wild boar, was seized with a violent and dangerous disorder. The beasts of the forest flocked in great numbers to pay their respects to him upon the occasion, and and scarce one was absent except the Fox. The Wolf, an illnatured and malicious beast, seized this opportunity to accuse the Fox of pride, ingratitude, and disaffection to his majesty. In the midst of his invective, the Fox entered; who having heard part of the Wolf's accusation, and observing the Lion's countenance to be kindling into wrath, thus adroitly excused himself, and retorted upon his accuser. With a tone of zealous loyalty he addressed the assembly thus: May the King live for ever! then turning to the Lion—I see many here, who, with mere lip-service, have pretended to shew you their loyalty: but form my part, from the moment I heard of your majesty's illness, neglecting useless compliments, I employed myself day and night to enquire among the most learned physicians, an infallable remedy for your disease, and have at length happily been informed of one. It is a plaster made from part of the skin of a Wolf, taken warm from his back, and laid to your majesty's stomach. This remedy was no sooner proposed, than it was determined that the experiment should be tried: and whilst the operation was performing; the Fox, with a sarcastic smile, whispered this useful maxim in the Wolf's ear—If you would be safe from harm yourself, learn for the future, not to meditate mischief against others.

H

FABLE
FABLE XXXVI.

The Blind Man and the Lame.

'IS from our wants and infirmities that almost all the connections of society take their rise.

A Blind Man, being stopped in a bad piece of road, meets with a Lame Man, and intreats him to guide him through the difficulty he was got into. How can I do that, replied the Lame Man, since I am scarce able to drag myself along? but as you appear to be very strong, if you will carry me, we will seek our fortunes together. It will then be my interest to warn you of any thing that may obstruct your way: your feet shall be my feet, and my eyes yours. With all my heart, returned the Blind Man; let us render each other our mutual services. So taking his lame companion on his back, they by means of their union, travelled on with safety and pleasure.
MODERN FABLES.

FABLE XXXVII.

The Lion, the Bear, the Monkey, and the Fox.

The Tyrant of the forest issued a proclamation, commanding all his subjects to repair immediately to his royal den. Among the rest, the Bear made his appearance: but pretending to be offended with the stumps which issued from the monarch's apartment, he was imprudent enough to hold his nose in his majesty's presence. This insolence was so highly resented, that the Lion in a rage laid him dead at his feet. The Monkey, observing what had passed, trembled for his carcase; and attempted to conciliate favour by the most abject flattery. He began with protesting, that for his part, he thought the apartments were perfumed with Arabian spices; and exclaiming against the rudeness of the Bear, admired the beauty of his majesty's paws, so happily formed, he said, to correct the insolence of clowns. This fulsome adulation, instead of being received as he expected, proved no less offensive, than the rudeness of the Bear: and the courtly Monkey was in like manner extended by the side of Sir Bruin. And now his majesty cast his eye upon the Fox. Well, Reynard, said he, and what scent do you discover here? Great prince, replied replied the cautious Fox, my nose was never esteemed my most distinguishing sense: and at present I would by no means venture to give my opinion, as I have unfortunately got a terrible cold.

FABLE XXXVIII.

The Owl and the Nightingale.

A formal solemn Owl had many years made his habitation in a grove amongst the ruins of an old monastery, and had pored so often on some mouldy manuscripts, the stupid relics of a monkish library, that he grew infected with the pride and pedantry of the place; and mistaking gravity for wisdom, would sit whole days with his eyes half shut, fancying himself profoundly learned. It happened, as he sat one evening, half buried in meditation, and half in sleep, that a Nightingale, unluckily perching near him, began her melodious lays. He started from his reverie, and with a horrid screech interrupted her song—Be gone, cried he, thou impertinent minstrel, nor distract with noisy dissonance, my sublime contemplations; and know, vain songster, that harmony consists in truth alone, which is gained by laborious study; and not in languishing notes, fit only to soothe the ear of a love-sick maid. Conceited pedant! returned turned the Nightingale, whose wisdom lies only in the feathers that muffle up thy unmeaning face; music is a natural and rational entertainment, and though not adapted to the ears of an Owl, has ever been relished and admired by all who are possessed of true taste and elegance.

FABLE XXXIX.

The Ant and the Caterpillar.

As a Caterpillar was advancing very slowly along one of the alleys of a beautiful garden, he was met by a pert lively Ant, who toffing up her head with a scornful air, cried, prithee get out of the way, thou poor creeping animal, and do not presume to obstruct the paths of thy superiors, by wriggling along the road, and besmearing the walks appropriated to their footsteps. Poor creature! thou lookest like a thing half made, which nature, not liking, threw by unfinished. I could almost pity thee, methinks; but it is beneath one of my quality to talk to such little mean creatures as thou art: and so, poor crawling wretch, adieu.

The humble Caterpillar struck dumb with this disdainful language, retired, went to work, wound himself up in a silken cell, and at the appointed time time came out a beautiful Butterfly. Just as he was issuing forth, he observed the scornful Ant passing by. Proud insect, said he, stop a moment, and listen to what I shall say. Let me advise you never to despise any one for his condition, as there are none so mean, but they may one day change their fortune. You behold me now exalted in the air, whereas you must creep as long as you live.

Fable XL.

The two Foxes.

TWO Foxes formed a stratagem to enter a hen-roost: which having successfully executed, and killed the cock, the hens, and the chickens, they began to feed upon them with singular satisfaction. One of the Foxes, who was young and inconsiderate, was for devouring them all upon the spot: the other, who was old and covetous, proposed to reserve some of them for another time. “For experience, child, said he, has made me wise, and I have seen many unexpected events since I came into the world. Let us provide, therefore, against what may happen, and not consume all our stores at one meal.” “All this is wonderous wise, replied the young Fox; but for my part, I am resolved not to stir till till I have eaten as much as will serve me a whole week: for who would be mad enough to return hither? when it is certain the owner of these fowls will watch for us, and if he should catch us, would certainly put us to death.” After this short discourse, each pursued his own scheme: the young Fox eat till he burst himself, and had scarcely strength to reach his hole before he died. The old one, who thought it much better to deny his appetite for the present, and lay up provision for the future, returned the next day, and was killed by the farmer. Thus every age has its peculiar vice: the young suffer by their insatiable thirst after pleasure; and the old, by their incorrigible and inordinate avarice.

FABLE XLII.

The conceited Owl.

A Young Owl having accidentally seen himself in a crystal fountain, conceived the highest opinion of his personal perfections. ’Tis time, said he, that Hymen should give me children as beautiful as myself, to be the glory of the night, and the ornament of our groves. What pity would it be, if the race of the most accomplished of birds should be extinct for my want of a mate! Happy the female who is destined to spend spend her life with me! Full of these self-approving thoughts, he intreated the Crow to propose a match between him and the royal daughter of the Eagle. Do you imagine, said the Crow, that the noble Eagle, whose pride it is to gaze on the brightest of the heavenly luminaries, will consent to marry his daughter to you, who cannot see the sun without opening your eyes whilst it is day-light? But the self-conceited Owl was deaf to all that his friend could urge; who after much persuasion, was at length prevailed upon to undertake the commission. His proposal was received in the manner that might be expected: the king of birds laughed him to scorn. However, being a monarch of some humour, he ordered him to acquaint the Owl, that if he would meet him the next morning at sun-rise in the middle of the sky, he would consent to give him his daughter in marriage. The presumptuous Owl undertook to perform the condition; but being dazzled with the sun, and his head growing giddy, he fell from his height upon a rock; from whence being pursued by a flight of birds, he was glad at last to make his escape into the hollow of an old oak; where he passed the remainder of his days in that obscurity, for which nature designed him.
NOTHING is more common than for men to condemn the very same actions in others, which they practise themselves whenever occasion offers.

A Fox and a Cat having made a party to travel together, beguiled the tediousness of their journey by a variety of philosophical conversations. Of all the moral virtues, exclaimed Reynard, mercy is sure the noblest! What say you, my sage friend, is it not so? Undoubtedly, replied the Cat, with a most demure countenance; nothing is more becoming, in a creature of any sensibility, than a compassionate disposition. While they were thus moralizing, and mutually complimenting each other on the wisdom of their respective reflections; a Wolf darted out, from a wood, upon a flock of sheep which were feeding in an adjacent meadow; and without being in the least affected by the moving lamentations of a poor lamb, devoured it before their eyes. Horrible cruelty! exclaimed the Cat; why does he not feed on vermin, instead of making his barbarous meals meals on such innocent creatures? Reynard agreed with his friend in the observation: to which he added several very pathetic remarks on the odiousness of a sanguinary temper. Their indignation was rising in its warmth and zeal, when they arrived at a little cottage by the way-side; where the tender-hearted Reynard immediately cast his eye upon a fine cock that was strutting about in the yard. And now, adieu moralizing: he leaped over the pales, and without any sort of scruple demolished his prize in an instant. In the mean while, a plump mouse which ran out of the stable, totally put to flight our Cat's philosophy, who fell to the repast without the least commiseration.

FABLE XLIII.

The two Horses.

Two Horses were travelling the road together; one loaded with a sack of flour, the other with a sum of money. The latter, proud of his splendid burthen, tossed his head with an air of conscious superiority, and every now and then cast a look of contempt upon his humble companion. In passing through a wood, they were met by a gang of highwaymen, who immediately seized upon the Horse that was carrying the treasure: but the spirited steed, not being altogether disposed to stand so quietly as was necessary for their purpose, they beat him most unmecifully; and after plundering him of his boasted load, left him to lament at his leisure the cruel bruises he had received. Friend, said his despised companion to him, who had now reason to triumph in his turn, distinguished posts are often dangerous to those who possess them: if you had served a miller, as I do, you might have travelled the road unmolested.

FABLE XLIV.

The Dove and the Ant.

We should be always ready to do good offices, even to the meanest of our fellow creatures; as there is no one to whose assistance we may not, upon some occasion or other, be greatly indebted.

A Dove was sipping from the banks of a rivulet, when an Ant, who was at the same time trailing a grain of corn along the edge of the brook, inadvertently fell in. The Dove observing the helpless insect struggling in vain to reach the shore, was touched with compassion; and plucking a blade of grass, dropped it into the stream; by means means of which the poor Ant, like a ship-wrecked sailor upon a plank, got safe to land. She had scarcely arrived there, when she perceived a fowler just going to discharge his piece at her deliverer: upon which she instantly crept up his foot and stung him on the ankle. The sportsman starting, occasioned a rusling among the boughs, which alarmed the Dove, who immediately sprung up, and by that means escaped the danger with which she was threatened.

FABLE XLV.

The Parrot.

A Certain Widower, in order to amuse his solitary hours, and in some measure supply the conversation of his departed helpmate of loquacious memory, determined to purchase a Parrot. With this view he applied to a dealer in birds, who shewed him a large collection of Parrots of various kinds. Whilst they were exercising their talkative talents before him, one repeating the cries of the town, another asking for a cup of sack, and a third bawling out for a coach, he observed a green Parrot, perched in a thoughtful manner at a distance upon the foot of a table: And so you, my grave gentleman, said he, are quite silent. To which the Parrot replied, like a philosophical bird, "I think the more." Pleased with this sensible answer, our Widower immediately paid down his price, and took home the bird; conceiving great things from a creature, who had given so striking a specimen of his parts. But after having instructed him during a whole month, he found to his great disappointment, that he could get nothing more from him than the fatiguing repetition of the same dull sentence, "I think the more." I find, said he in great wrath, that thou art a most invincible fool: and ten times more a fool was I, for having formed a favourable opinion of thy abilities upon no better foundation, than an affected solemnity.

FABLE XLVI.

The Cat and the Bat.

A Cat having devoured her master's favourite bullfinch, over-heard him threatening to put her to death the moment he could find her. In this distress she preferred a prayer to Jupiter; vowing, if he would deliver her from her present danger, that never while she lived would she eat another bird. Not long afterwards a bat most invitingly flew into the room where Puss was purring in the window. The question was, how to act upon so tempting an occasion? Her appetite tite pressed hard on one side; and her vow threw some scruples in her way on the other. At length she hit upon a most convenient distinction to remove all difficulties, by determining that as a bird indeed it was unlawful prize, but as a mouse she might very conscientiously eat it; and accordingly without further debate fell to the repast.

Thus it is that men are apt to impose upon themselves by vain and groundless distinctions, when conscience and principle are at variance with interest and inclination.

FABLE XLVII.

The two Lizards.

As two Lizards were basking under a south wall, How contemptible, said one of them, is our condition! We exist, 'tis true, but that is all; for we hold no sort of rank in the creation, and are utterly unnoticed by the world. Cursed obscurity! Why was I not rather born a stag, to range at large, the pride and glory of some royal forest? It happened that in the midst of these unjust murmurs, a pack of hounds was heard in full cry after the very creature he was envying, who being quite spent with the chase, was torn in pieces by the dogs in sight of our two Lizards.

And
And is this the lordly flag, whose place in the creation you wished to hold? said the wiser Lizard to his complaining friend: Let his sad fate teach you to bless providence for placing you in that humble situation, which secures you from the dangers of a more elevated rank.

Fable XLVIII.

Jupiter's Lottery.

Jupiter, in order to please mankind, directed Mercury to give notice that he had established a Lottery, in which there were no blanks: and that, amongst a variety of other valuable chances, Wisdom was the highest prize. It was Jupiter's command, that in this Lottery, some of the gods should also become adventurers. The tickets being disposed of, and the wheels placed, Mercury was employed to preside at the drawing. It happened that the best prize fell to Minerva: upon which a general murmur ran thro' the assembly, and hints were thrown out, that Jupiter had used some unfair practices to secure this desirable lot to his daughter. Jupiter, that he might at once both punish and silence these impious clamours of the human race, presented them with Folly in the place of Wisdom; with which they went away perfectly well contented:

and
and from that time the greatest Fools have always looked upon themselves as the Wisest Men.

FABLE XLIX.

The litigious Cats.

Two Cats having stolen some cheese, could not agree about dividing the prize. In order therefore to settle the dispute, they consented to refer the matter to a Monkey. The proposed arbitrator very readily accepted the office, and producing a ballance, put a part into each scale. "Let me see—(said he) ay—this lump outweighs the other:" and immediately bit off a considerable piece in order to reduce it, he observed, to an equilibrium. The opposite scale was now become the heaviest; which afforded our conscientious judge an additional reason for a second mouthful. Hold, hold, said the two Cats, who began to be alarmed for the event,—give us our respective shares and we are satisfied. If you are satisfied, returned the Monkey, justice is not: a cause of this intricate nature is by no means so soon determined. Upon which he continued to nibble first one piece and then the other, till the poor Cats seeing their cheese gradually diminishing, intreated him to give himself no farther trouble, but deliver to them what remained. Not so fast, I I beseech ye friends, replied the Monkey; we owe justice to ourselves as well as to you: what remains is due to me in right of my office. Upon which, he crammed the whole into his mouth, and with great gravity dismissed the court.

FABLE L.

The two Dogs.

HASTY and inconsiderate connexions are generally attended with great disadvantages: and much of every man's good or ill fortune depends upon the choice he makes of his friends.

A good-natured Spaniel overtook a furry Maf-tiff, as he was travelling upon the high road. Tray, although an entire stranger to Tyger, very civilly accosted him: And if it would be no interruption, he said, he should be glad to bear him company on his way. Tyger, who happened not to be altogether in so growling a mood as usual, accepted the proposal: and they very ami-cably pursued their journey together. In the midst of their conversation, they arrived at the next village; where Tyger began to display his malignant disposition, by an unprovoked attack upon every dog he met. The villagers immediately ately fallied forth with great indignation to rescue their respective favourites; and falling upon our two friends, without distinction or mercy, poor Tray was most cruelly treated, for no other reason, but his being found in bad company.

FABLE LI.

Death and Cupid.

JUPITER sent forth Death and Cupid to travel round the world, giving each of them a bow in his hand, and a quiver of arrows at his back. It was ordered by the supreme disposer of all events, that the arrows of Love should only wound the young, in order to supply the decays of mortal men; and those of Death were to strike old age, and free the world of an useless charge. Our travellers, being one day extremely fatigued with their journey, rested themselves under the covert of a wood, and throwing down their arrows in a promiscuous manner before them, they both fell fast asleep. They had not reposéd themselves long, before they were awakened by a sudden noife; when hastily gathering up their arms, each in the confusion took by mistake some of the darts that belonged to the other. By this means, it frequently happened that Death vanquished the young, and Cupid subdued the old.

Jupiter
Jupiter observed the error, but did not think proper to redress it; foreseeing that some good might arise from their unlucky exchange. And in fact, if men were wise, they would learn from this mistake to be apprehensive of death in their youth, and to guard against the amorous passions in their old age.

Fable LII.

The Mock-bird.

There is a certain Bird in the West-Indies, which has the faculty of mimicking the notes of every other songster, without being able himself to add any original strains to the concert. As one of these Mock-birds was displaying his talents of ridicule among the branches of a venerable wood: 'Tis very well, said a little warbler, speaking in the name of all the rest, we grant you that our music is not without its faults: but why will you not favour us with a strain of your own?
HOW strangely all mankind differ in their opinions! and how strongly each is attached to his own!

Jupiter, one day, enjoying himself over a bowl of nectar, and in a merry humour, determined to make mankind a present. Momus was appointed to convey it to them; who mounted on a rapid car, was presently on earth. Come hither, says he, ye happy mortals; great Jupiter has opened for your benefit his all-gracious hands. 'Tis true, he made you somewhat short-sighted, but to remedy that inconvenience, behold, how he has favoured you! So saying, he unloosed his portmanteau; when an infinite number of Spectacles tumbled out, and were picked up by the crowd with all the eagerness imaginable. There was enow for all, every man had his pair. But it was soon found that these Spectacles did not represent objects to all mankind alike: for one pair was purple, another blue; one was white, and another black: some of the glasses were red, some green, and some yellow. In short, there were of all manner of colours, and every every shade of colour. However, notwithstanding this diversity, every man was charmed with his own, as believing it the best; and enjoyed in opinion, all the satisfaction of truth.
FABLES.

BOOK III.

NEWTLY INVENTED.
FABLE I.

The Red-breast and Sparrow.

As a Red-breast was singing on a tree by the side of a rural cottage, a Sparrow perched upon the thatch took occasion thus to reprimand him. And dost thou, said he, with thy dull autumnal note presume to emulate the Birds of Spring? Can thy weak warblings pretend to vie with the sprightly accent of the Thrush and the Blackbird? with the various melody of the Lark or Nightingale? Whom other birds, far thy superiors, have been long content to admire in silence. Judge with candour at least, replied the Robin; nor impute those efforts to ambition solely, which may may sometimes flow from Love of the Art. I reverence indeed, but by no means envy, the birds whose fame has stood the test of ages. Their songs have charmed both hill and dale; but their season is past, and their throats are silent. I feel not, however, the ambition to surpass or equal them: my efforts are of a much humbler nature; and I may surely hope for pardon, while I endeavour to cheer those forlorn valleys, by an attempt to imitate the strains I love.

Fable II.

The two Bees.

On a fine morning in May, two Bees set forward in quest of honey; the one wise and temperate, the other careless and extravagant. They soon arrived at a garden enriched with aromatic herbs; the most fragrant flowers, and the most delicious fruits. They regaled themselves for a time on the various dainties that were spread before them: the one loading his thigh at intervals with provisions for the hive against the distant winter; the other, revelling in sweets without regard to any thing but his present gratification. At length they found a wide-mouthed phial, that hung beneath the bough of a peach-tree, filled with honey ready tempered, and exposed posed to their taste in the most alluring manner. The thoughtless Epicure, spite of all his friend’s remonstrances, plunged headlong into the vessel, resolving to indulge himself in all the pleasures of sensuality. The Philosopher, on the other hand, tipped a little with caution, but being suspicious of danger, flew off to fruits and flowers; where by the moderation of his meals, he improved his relish for the true enjoyment of them. In the evening, however, he called upon his friend, to enquire whether he would return to the hive; but found him surfeited in sweets, which he was as unable to leave, as to enjoy. Clogged in his wings, enfeebled in his feet, and his whole frame totally enervated, he was but just able to bid his friend adieu, and to lament with his latest breath, that though a taste of pleasure might quicken the relish of life, an unrestrained indulgence is inevitable destruction.

F A B L E III.

The Diamond and the Glow-worm.

A Diamond happened to fall from the solitaire of a young lady, as she was walking one evening on a terrace in the garden. A Glow-worm who had beheld it sparkling in its descent, soon as the gloom of night had eclipsed its lustré, began began to mock and to insult it. Art thou that wonderous thing, that vaunteft of such prodigious brightness? Where now is all thy boasted brilliancy? Alas, in evil hour has fortune thrown thee within the reach of my superior blaze. Conceited insect, replied the Gem, thou owefth thy feeble glimmer to the darkness that surrounths thee: know, my luftre bears the test of day, and even derives its chief advantage from that distinguiishing light, which discovers thee to be no more than a dark and paltry Worm.

FABLE IV.

The Ostrich and the Pelican.

The Ostrich one day met the Pelican, and observing her breast all bloody, Good God! says she to her, what is the matter? What accident has befallen you? You certainly have been seized by some savage beast of prey, and have with difficulty escaped from his merciless claws. Do not be surprifed, friend, replied the Pelican: no such accident, nor indeed, any thing more than common, hath happened to me. I have only been engaged in my ordinary employment of tending my neft, of feeding my dear little ones, and nourishing them with the vital blood from my bosom. Your answer, returned the Ostrich, trich, astonishes me still more than the horrid figure you make. What! is this your practice, to tear your own flesh, to spill your own blood, and to sacrifice yourself in this cruel manner to the important cravings of your young ones? I know not which to pity most, your misery, or your folly. Be advised by me; have some regard for yourself; and leave off this barbarous custom of mangling your own body: as for your children, commit them to the care of providence, and make yourself quite easy about them. My example may be of use to you. I lay my eggs upon the ground, and just cover them lightly over with sand: if they have the good luck to escape being crushed by the tread of man or beast, the warmth of the sun broods upon, and hatches them; and in due time my young ones come forth: I leave them to be nursed by nature, and fostered by the elements; I give myself no trouble about them, and I neither know nor care what becomes of them. Unhappy wretch, says the Pelican, who art hardened against thy offspring, and through want of natural affection renderest thy travail fruitless to thyself! who knowest not the sweets of a parent’s anxiety, the tender delight of a mother’s sufferings! It is not I, but thou that art cruel to thy own flesh. Thy insensibility may exempt thee from a temporary porary inconvenience, and an inconsiderable pain; but at the same time it makes thee inattentive to a most necessary duty, and incapable of relishing the pleasure that attends it: a pleasure, the most exquisite that nature hath indulged to us; in which pain itself is swallowed up and lost, or only serves to heighten the enjoyment.

FABLE V.

The Hounds in Couples.

A Huntsman was leading forth his Hounds one morning to the chase, and had linked several of the young Dogs in Couples, to prevent their following every scent, and hunting disorderly, as their own inclinations and fancy should direct them. Among others, it was the fate of Jowler and Vixen to be thus yoked together. Jowler and Vixen were both young and unexperienced; but had for some time been constant companions, and seemed to have entertained a great fondness for each other; they used to be perpetually playing together, and in any quarrel that happened, always took one another's part; it might have been expected therefore, that it would not be disagreeable to them to be still more closely united. However in fact it proved otherwise: they had not been long joined together before both parties were observed to express uneasiness at their present situation. Different inclinations and opposite wills began to discover and to exert themselves: if one chose to go this way, the other was as eager to take the contrary; if one was pressing forward, the other was sure to lag behind; Vixen pulled back Jowler, and Jowler dragged along Vixen, Jowler growled at Vixen, and Vixen snapped at Jowler: till at last it came to a downright quarrel between them; and Jowler treated Vixen in a very rough and ungenerous manner, without any regard to the inferiority of her strength, or the tenderness of her sex. As they were thus continually vexing and tormenting one another, an old Hound, who had observed all that passed, came up to them, and thus reproved them: "What a couple of silly Puppies you are, to be perpetually worrying yourselves at this rate! What hinders your going on peaceably and quietly together? Cannot you compromise the matter between you, by each consulting the other's inclination a little! at least, try to make a virtue of necessity, and submit to what you cannot remedy: you cannot get rid of the chains; but you may make them fit easy upon you. I am an old Dog, and let my age and experience instruct you: when I was in the same circumstance with you, I soon found, that that thwarting my companion, was only tormenting myself; and my yoke-fellow happily came into the same way of thinking. We endeavoured to join in the same pursuits, and to follow one another's inclinations; and so we jogged on together, not only with ease and quiet, but with comfort and pleasure. We found by experience, that mutual compliance not only compensates for liberty, but is even attended with a satisfaction and delight, beyond what liberty itself can give."

FABLE VI.

The Miser and the Magpye.

As a Miser sat at his desk, counting over his heaps of gold; a Magpye eloping from his cage, picked up a guinea, and hopped away with it. The Miser, who never failed to count his money over a second time, immediately missed the piece, and rising up from his seat in the utmost consternation, observed the felon hiding it in a crevice of the floor. And art thou, cried he, that worst of thieves, who hast robbed me of my gold, without the plea of necessity, and without regard to its proper use? But thy life shall atone for so preposterous a villany. Soft words, good master, quoth the Magpye. Have I then injured you, in any other sense than than you defraud the public? And am I not using your money in the same manner you do yourself? If I must lose my life for hiding a single guinea, what do you, I pray, deserve, who secrete so many thousands?

FABLE VII.

The Sensitive Plant and the Thistle.

A Thistle happened to spring up very near to a Sensitive Plant. The former observing the extreme bashfulness and delicacy of the latter, addressed her in the following manner. Why are you so modest and reserved, my good neighbour, as to withdraw your leaves at the approach of strangers? Why do you shrink as if you were afraid, from the touch of every hand? Take example and advice from me: if I liked not their familiarity, I would make them keep their distance, nor should any saucy finger provoke me unreveved. Our tempers and qualities, replied the other, are widely different. I have neither the ability nor inclination to give offence: you it seems are by no means destitute of either. My desire is to live peaceably in the station wherein I am placed; and though my humility may now and then cause me a moment's uneasiness, it tends on the whole to preserve my tranquility.
tranquility. The case is otherwise with you, whose irritable temper, and revengeful disposition, will probably one time or other be the cause of your destruction. While they were thus arguing the point, the gardiner came with his little spaddle, in order to lighten the earth round the stem of the Sensitive Plant; but perceiving the Thistle, he thrust his instrument thro' the root of it, and directly tossed it out of his garden.

FABLE VIII.

The Poet and the Death-watch.

As a Poet sate in his closet, feasting his imagination on the hopes of fame and immortality; he was startled on a sudden with the ominous sound of a Death-watch. However, immediately recollecting himself—Vain insect, said he, cease thy impertinent forebodings, sufficient indeed to frighten the weakness of women or of children: but far beneath the notice of a Poet and a Philosopher. As for me, whatever accident may threaten my life; my fame, spite of thy prognostics, shall live to future ages. May be so, replied the insect, I find at least, thou hadst rather listen to the Moggot in thy head, than to the Worm beneath thy table; but know, that that the suggestions of vanity are altogether as deceitful as those of superstition.

FABLE IX.

Pythagoras and the Critic.

PYTHAGORAS was one day very earnestly engaged in taking an exact measure of the length of the olympic course. One of those conceited Critics, who aim at every thing, and are ready to interpose with their opinion upon all subjects, happened to be present; and could not help smiling to himself to see the Philosopher so employed, and to observe what great attention and pains he bestowed upon such a business. And pray, says he, accosting Pythagoras, may I presume to ask, with what design you have given yourself this trouble? Of that, replied the Philosopher; I shall very readily inform you. We are assured, that Hercules when he instituted the olympic games, himself laid out this course by measure, and determined it to the length of six hundred feet, measuring it by the standard of his own foot. Now by taking an exact measure of this space, and seeing how much it exceeds the measure of the same number of feet now in use, we can find how much the foot of Hercules, and in proportion his whole stature, flature, exceeded that of the present generation. A very curious speculation truly, says the Critic, and of great use and importance, no doubt! And so you will demonstrate to us, that the bulk of this fabulous hero was equal to his extravagant enterprises and his marvellous exploits. And pray Sir, what may be the result of your enquiry at last? I suppose, you can now tell me exactly to a hair's breadth, how tall Hercules was. The result of my enquiry, replied the Philosopher, is this; and it is a conclusion of greater use and importance, than you seem to expect from it; that if you will always estimate the labours of the philosopher, the designs of the patriot, and the actions of the hero, by the standard of your own narrow conceptions, you will ever be greatly mistaken in your judgment concerning them.

FABLE X.

The Bear.

A bear who was bred in the savage desarts of Siberia, had an inclination to see the world. He travelled from forest to forest, and from one kingdom to another, making many profound observations in his way. Among the rest of his excursions, he came by accident into a farmer's yard, where he saw a number of poultry standing
1. The Redbreast & the Sparrow.
2. The two Bees.
3. The Diamond and the Glow-worm.
4. The Ostrich and the Pelican.
5. The Hounds in couples.
6. The Miser & the Magpie.
7. The Sensitive Plant & Thistle.
8. The Poet & the Death watch.
10. The Bear.
11. The Stork & the Crow.
12. Echo and the Owl.
ing to drink by the side of a pool. Observing that after every sip they turned up their heads toward the sky, he could not forbear enquiring the reason of so peculiar a ceremony. They told him, that it was by way of returning thanks to heaven for the benefits they received; and was indeed an ancient and religious custom, which they could not, with a safe conscience, or without impiety, omit. Here the Bear burst into a fit of laughter, at once mimicking their gestures, and ridiculing their superstition, in the most contemptuous manner. On this, the Cock, with a spirit suitable to the boldness of his character, addressed him in the following words. As you are a stranger, Sir, you perhaps may be excused the indecency of this behaviour; yet give me leave to tell you, that none but a Bear would ridicule any religious ceremonies whatsoever, in the presence of those who believe them of importance.

FABLE XI.

The Stork and the Crow.

A Stork and a Crow had once a strong contention, which of them stood highest in the favour of Jupiter. The Crow allledged his skill in omens, his infallibility in prophecies, and his his great use to the priests of that deity in all their sacrifices and religious ceremonies. The Stork urged only his blameless life, the care he took to preserve his offspring, and the assistance he lent his parents under the infirmities of age. It happened, as it generally does in religious disputes, that neither of them could confute the other; so they both agreed to refer the decision to Jupiter himself. On their joint application, the god determined thus between them. Let none of my creatures despair of my regard: I know their weakness; I pity their errors; and whatever is well meant, I accept as it was intended. Yet sacrifices or ceremonies are in themselves of no importance, and every attempt to penetrate the counsels of the gods, is altogether as vain as it is presumptuous: but he who pays to Jupiter a just honour and reverence, who leads the most temperate life, and who does the most good in proportion to his abilities; as he best answers the end of his creation, will assuredly stand highest in the favour of his creator.

FABLE
FABLE XII.

Echo and the Owl.

The vain hear the flatteries of their own imagination, and fancy them to be the voice of fame.

A solemn Owl puffed up with vanity, sat repeating her screams at midnight, from the hollow of a blasted oak. And whence, cryed she, proceeds this awful silence, unless it be to favour my superior melody? Surely the groves are hushed in expectation of my voice, and when I sing, all nature listens. An Echo resounding from an adjacent rock, replied immediately, "all nature listens." The nightingale, resumed she, has usurped the sovereignty by night: her note indeed is musical, but mine is sweeter far. The voice confirming her opinion, replied again, "is sweeter far." Why then am I diffident, continued she, why do I fear to join the tuneful choir? The Echo still flattering her vanity repeated, "join the tuneful choir." Roused by this empty phantom of encouragement, she on the morrow mingled her hootings with the harmony of the groves. But the tuneful songsters, disgusted with her noise, and affronted by her impudence, puddence, unanimously drove her from their society, and still continue to pursue her wherever she appears.

FABLE XIII.

Prometheus.

Prometheus formed man of the finest clay, and animated his work with fire stolen from heaven. He endowed him with all the faculties that are to be found amongst the animal creation: he gave him the courage of the lion, the subtilty of the fox, the providence of the ant, and the industry of the bee; and he enabled him, by the superiority of his understanding, to subdue them all, and to make them subservient to his use and pleasure. He discovered to him the metals hidden in the bowels of the earth, and shewed him their several uses. He instructed him in every thing that might tend to cultivate and civilize human life: he taught him to till the ground, and to improve the fertility of nature; to build houses, to cover himself with garments, and to defend himself against the inclemencies of the air and the seasons; to compound medicines of salutary herbs, to heal wounds, and to cure diseases; to construct ships, to cross the seas, and to communicate to every country country the riches of all. In a word, he indued him with sense and memory, with sagacity and invention, with art and science: and to crown all, he gave him an insight into futurity. But, alas! this latter gift, instead of improving, wholly destroyed the proper effect of all the former. Furnished with all the means and instruments of happiness, man nevertheless was miserable; through the knowledge and dread of future evil, he was incapable of enjoying present good. Prometheus saw, and immediately resolved to remedy this inconvenience: he effectually restored man to a capacity of happiness, by depriving him of prescience, and giving him hope in its stead.

FABLE XIV.

Momus.

'TIS said that Momus was perpetually blaming and ridiculing whatever he saw. Even the works of the gods themselves could not escape his universal censure. The eyes of the bull, he said, were so placed by Jupiter, that they could not direct his horns in pushing at his enemies. The houses which Minerva had instructed men to build, were contrived so very injudiciously, that they could not be removed from a bad neighbourhood, nor from any other inconvenience.
In short, the frame of man himself was in his opinion extremely defective; having no window in his bosom, that might demonstrate his sincerity, or betray his wicked purposes and prevent their execution. These and many other faults were found in the productions of nature; but when he surveyed the works of art, there was no end of his altercation. Jupiter, being resolved to try how far his malice would proceed, sent his daughter Venus to desire that he would give his opinion of her beauty. She appeared accordingly before the churlish god, trembling at the apprehension of his known severity. He examined her proportions with all the rigour of an envious critic. But her shape and complexion were so striking, and her smiles and graces so very engaging, that he found it impossible to give the least colour to any objection he could make. Yet, to shew how hard malevolence will struggle for a cavil; as she was retiring from his presence, he begged she would acquaint her father, that whatever graces might be in her motion, yet—her slippers were too noisy.
FABLE XV.

The Butterfly, the Snail, and the Bee.

A Butterfly proudly perched on the gawdy leaves of a French marygold, was boasting the vast extent and variety of his travels. I have ranged, said he, over the graceful and majestic scenes of *Hagley, and have feasted my eyes with elegance and variety at †The Leasowes. I have wandered through regions of Eglantine and Honey-suckle, I have revelled in kisses on beds of Violets and cowslips, and have enjoyed the delicious fragrance of Roses and Carnations. In short, my fancy unbounded, and my flights unrestrained, I have visited with perfect freedom all the flowers of the field or garden, and must be allowed to know the world, in a superlative degree.

A Snail, who hung attentive to his wonders on a cabbage-leaf, was struck with admiration; and concluded him, from all this experience, to be the wisest of animal creation.

It happened that a Bee pursued her occupation on a neighbouring bed of marjoram, and having heard heard our ostentatious vagrant, reprimanded him in this manner. Vain, empty flutterer, said she, whom instruction cannot improve, nor experience itself enlighten! Thou hast rambled over the world; wherein does thy knowledge of it consist? Thou hast seen variety of objects; what conclusions hast thou drawn from them? Thou hast tasted of every amusement; hast thou extracted any thing for use? I too am a traveller: go and look into my hive; and let my treasures intimate to thee, that the end of travelling is, to collect materials either for the use and emolument of private life, or for the advantage of the community.

* Lord Lyttelton's. † Mr. Shenstone's.

FABLE XVI.

The Tuberose and the Sun-flower.

A Tuberose in a bow-window on the northside of a stately villa, addressed a Sun-flower which grew on a slope, that was contiguous to the house. Pray, says he, neighbour Turnsole, to what purpose do you pay all this devotion to that fictitious deity of yours, the Sun? Why are you continually distorting your body, and casting up your eyes to that glaring luminary? What superstition induces you to think, that we flowers exist only through his influence? Both you you and I are surely indebted to the hot-bed, and to the diligence of the gardiner, for our production and support. For my part, I shall reserve my homage, together with my sweets, for that benevolent master who is continually watering and refreshing me: nor do I desire ever to see the face of that Sun you so vainly idolize, while I can enjoy the cool shade of this magnificent falloon. Truce with thy blasphemies, replied the Sun-flower: why dost thou revile that glorious being, who dispenses life and vigour, not only to us, but to every part of the creation? Without this, alas! how inessential were the skill and vigilance of thy boasted master, either to support thy tender frame, or even to preserve his own! But this must ever be the case with such contracted understandings: sufficient, indeed, to point out our more immediate benefactors, without regarding the original source, from which all beneficence proceeds.

FABLE XVII.

_The Magpye and the Raven._

There was a certain Magpye, more busy and more loquacious than any of his tribe. His tongue was in perpetual motion, and himself continually upon the wing; fluttering from place place to place, and very seldom appearing twice together in the same company.

Sometimes you saw him with a flock of pigeons, plundering a field of new sown corn; anon, perched upon a cherry-tree with a parcel of tom-tits: the next moment, you would be surprised to find the same individual bird engaged with a flight of crows, and feasting upon a carcase.

He took it one day into his head to visit an old Raven who lived retired among the branches of a venerable oak; and there, at the foot of a lonely mountain, had passed near half a century.

I admire, said the prating bird, your most romantic situation, and the wildness of these rocks and precipices around you: I am absolutely transported with the murmur of that water-fall: methinks it diffuses a tranquility, surpassing all the joys of publick life. What an agreeable sequestration from worldly bustle and impertinence! what an opportunity of contemplating the divine beauties of nature! I shall most certainly, quit the gaieties of town, and for the sake of these rural scenes, and my good friend's conversation, pass the remainder of my days in the solitude he has chosen.

Well,
Well, Sir, replies the Raven, I shall be at all times glad to receive you in my old-fashioned way; but you and I should certainly prove most unsuitable companions. Your whole ambition is to shine in company, and to recommend yourself to the world by universal complaisance; whereas my greatest happiness consists in ease and privacy, and the select conversation of a few whom I esteem. I prefer a good heart to the most valuable tongue; and tho' much obliged to you for the politeness of your professions, yet I see your benevolence divided among so numerous an acquaintance, that a very slender share of it can remain for those you are pleased to honour with the name of friend.

FABLE XVIII.

The Diamond and the Loadstone.

A Diamond of great beauty and luster, observing, not only many other gems of a lower class ranged together with him in the same cabinet, but a Loadstone likewise placed not far from him; began to question the latter how he came there; and what pretensions he had to be ranked among the precious stones: he, who appeared to be no better than a mere flint; a sorry, coarse, rusty-looking pebble; without any the least least shining quality to advance him to such an honour: and concluded with desiring him to keep his distance, and pay a proper respect to his superiors. I find, said the Loadstone, you judge by external appearances; and it is your interest, that others should form their judgment by the same rule. I must own I have nothing to boast of in that respect; but I may venture to say, that I make amends for my outward defects, by my inward qualities. The great improvement of navigation in these latter ages is entirely owing to me. It is owing to me, that the distant parts of the world are known and accessible to each other; that the remotest nations are connected together, and all in a manner united into one common society; that by a mutual intercourse they relieve one another's wants, and all enjoy the several blessings peculiar to each. Great Britain is indebted to me for her wealth, her splendour, and her power; and the arts and sciences are in a great measure obliged to me for their late improvements, and their continual increase. I am willing to allow you your due praise in its full extent; you are a very pretty bawble; I am mightily delighted to see you glitter and sparkle; I look upon you with pleasure and surprize: but I must be convinced that you are of some sort of use, before I acknowledge ledge that you have any real merit, or treat you with that respect which you seem to demand.

Fable XIX.

The Boy and the Nettle.

A Little Boy playing in the fields, chanced to be stung by a Nettle, and came crying to his father: he told him, he had been hurt by that nasty weed several times before; that he was always afraid of it: and that now he did but just touch it, as lightly as possible, when he was so severely stung. Child, said he, your touching it so gently and timorously is the very reason of its hurting you. A Nettle may be handled safely, if you do it with courage and resolution: if you seize it boldly, and gripe it fast, be assured it will never sting you; and you will meet with many sorts of persons, as well as things in the world, which ought to be treated in the very same manner.

Fable XX.

The Monster in the Sun.

An Astronomer was observing the Sun thro' a Telescope, in order to take an exact draught of the several spots, which appear upon the face of of it. While he was intent upon his observations, he was on a sudden surprised with a new and astonishing appearance; a large portion of the surface of the Sun was at once covered by a Monster of enormous size, and horrible form; it had an immense pair of wings, a great number of legs, and a long and vast proboscis; and that it was alive, was very apparent, from its quick and violent motions, which the observer could, from time to time, plainly perceive. Being sure of the fact, (for how could he be mistaken in what he saw so clearly?) our Philosopher began to draw many surprising conclusions from premises so well established. He calculated the magnitude of this extraordinary animal; and found that he covered about two square degrees of the Sun's surface; that placed upon the earth he would spread over half one hemisphere of it; and that he was seven or eight times as big as the moon. But what was most astonishing, was the prodigious heat that he must endure: it was plain that he was something of the nature of the salamander, but of a far more fiery temperament; for it was demonstrable from the clearest principles, that in his present situation he must have acquired a degree of heat two thousand times exceeding that of red-hot iron. It was a Problem worth considering, whether he subsisted upon the the gross vapours of the Sun, and so from time to time cleared away those spots which they are perpetually forming, and which would otherwise wholly obscure and incrustate its face; or whether it might not feed on the solid substance of the orb itself, which by this means, together with the constant expence of light, must soon be exhausted and consumed; or whether he was not now and then supplied by the falling of some eccentric Comet into the Sun. However this might be, he found by computation, that the earth would be but short allowance for him for a few months: and farther, it was no improbable conjecture, that as the earth was destined to be destroyed by fire, this fiery flying Monster would remove hither at the appointed time, and might much more easily and conveniently effect a conflagration, than any other Comet, hitherto provided for that service. In the earnest pursuit of these, and many the like deep and curious speculations, the Astronomer was engaged, and was preparing to communicate them to the public. In the mean time, the discovery began to be much talked of; all the virtuosi gathered together to see so strange a sight. They were equally convinced of the accuracy of the observation, and of the conclusions so clearly deduced from it. At last, one, more cautious than the rest, was resolved, solved, before he gave a full assent to the report of his senses, to examine the whole process of the affair, and all the parts of the instrument: he opened the Telescope, and behold! a small Fly was inclosed in it, which having settled on the center of the object-glass, had given occasion to all this marvellous Theory.

How often do men, thro' prejudice and passion, thro' envy and malice, fix upon the brightest and most exalted characters, the grossest and most improbable imputations. It behoves us upon such occasions to be upon our guard, and to suspend our judgments; the fault perhaps is not in the object, but in the mind of the observer.

FABLE XXI.

The discontented Bee.

A Bee complained to Jupiter, of the numerous evils to which her condition was exposed. Her body, she said, was weak and feeble, yet was she condemned to get her living by perpetual toil; she was benumbed by the cold of winter, and relaxed by the heat of summer. Her haunts were infested with poisonous weeds, and her flights obstructed by storms and tempests. In short,
SHORT, what with dangers from without, and diseases from within, her life was rendered one continual scene of anxiety and wretchedness. Behold now, said Jupiter, the frowardness and folly of this unthankful race! The flowers of the field I have spread before them as a feast, and have endeavoured to regale them with an endless variety. They now revel on odoriferous beds of thyme and lavender, and now on the still more fragrant banks of violets and roses. The business they complain of, is the extraction of honey; and, to alleviate their toil, I have allowed them wings, which readily transport them from one banquet to another. Storms, tempests, and noxious weeds, I have given them sagacity to shun; and if ever they are misled, 'tis thro' the preverseness of their inclinations. But thus it is with Bees, and thus with Men: they misconstrue the benevolence of my designs, and then complain that my decrees are rigid: they ungratefully overlook all the advantages, and magnify all the inconveniences of their station. But let my creatures pursue their happiness, thro' the paths marked out by nature; and they will then feel no pains, which they have not pleasures to compensate.
FABLE XXII.

The Snipe Shooter.

As a sportsman ranged the fields with his gun, attended by an experienced old Spaniel, he happened to spring a Snipe; and almost at the same instant, a covey of Partridges. Surprised at the accident, and divided in his aim, he let fly too indeterminately, and by this means missed them both. Ah, my good Master, said the Spaniel, you should never have two aims at once. Had you not been dazzled and seduced by the extravagant hope of Partridge, you would most probably have secured your Snipe.

FABLE XXIII.

The Beggar and his Dog.

A Beggar and his Dog sat at the gate of a noble Courtier, and were preparing to make a meal on a bowl of fragments from the Kitchenmaid. A poor Dependant of his Lordship's, who had been sharing the singular favour of a dinner at the Steward's table, was struck with their appearance, and stopped a little to observe them. The Beggar, hungry and voracious as any Courtier in Christendom, seized with greediness the choicest choiceft morfels, and swallowed them himself; the residue was divided into portions for his children. A crag was thrust into one pocket for honest Jack, a cruf! into another for bashful Tom, and a luncheon of cheese was wrapt up with care for the little favourite of his hopeful family. In short, if any thing was thrown to the Dog, it was a bone so closely picked, that it scarce afforded a pittance to keep life and soul together. How exactly alike, said the Dependant, is this poor Dog’s case and mine! He is watching for a dinner from a Master who cannot spare it; I for a place from a needy Lord, whose wants perhaps are greater than my own; and whose relations, more clamorous than any of this Beggar’s brats. Shrewdly was it said by an ingenious writer, a Courtier’s Dependant is a Beggar’s Dog.

FABLE XXIV.

The Sun and the Vapour.

In the evening of a summer’s day, as the Sun descended behind the western hills, he beheld a thick and unwholesome Vapour extending itself over the whole face of the vallies. Every shrub and every flower immediately folded up its leaves, and shrunk from the touch of this detested enemy. Well haft thou chosen, said the God of day, this this the hour of my departure, to spread thy pestilential influence, and taint the beauties of the creation. Enjoy for a short space the notable triumphs of thy malignity. I shall return again with the morning, repair thy mischiefs, and put an end to thy existence. May the Slanderer in thy fate discern his own, and be warned to dread the return of the Truth.

FABLE XXV.

Love and Folly.

In the most early state of things, and among the eldest of beings, existed that God, as the poets entitle him, or rather that Dæmon, as Plato calls him, whose name is Love. He was assisting to the father of the Gods in reducing Chaos into order, in establishing the harmony of the universe, and in regulating and putting in execution the laws, by which the operations of nature are performed, and the frame of the world subsists. Universal good seemed to be his only study, and he was the supreme delight both of Gods and men. But in process of time, among other disorders that arose in the universe, it appeared, that Love began to deviate very often from what had seemed, till now, to be his chief pursuit: he would raise frequent disturbances and confusion in in the course of nature; though it was always under the pretence of maintaining order and agreement. It seems he had entered into a very intimate acquaintance with a person, who had but lately made her appearance in the world. This person was Folly, the daughter of Pride and Ignorance. They were often together, and, as often as they were, some mischief was sure to be the consequence. By degrees he introduced her into the heavens; where it was their great joy by various artifices to lead the Gods into such measures, as involved them in many inconveniences, and exposed them to much ridicule. They deluded them all in their turns, except Minerva, the only divinity that escaped their wiles. Even Jupiter himself was induced by them to take some steps not at all suitable to the dignity of his character. Folly had gotten the intire ascendant over her companion; however, she was resolved to make still more sure of him, and engross him wholly to herself: with this design she infused a certain intoxicating juice into his nectar, the effects of which were so powerful, that in the end it utterly deprived him of his sight. Love was too much prejudiced in her favour, to apprehend her to be the cause of his misfortune; nor indeed did he seem to be in the least sensible of his condition. But his mother Venus Venus soon found it out: and in the excess of her grief and rage carried her complaint to Jupiter, conjuring him to punish the forceress, who had blinded her son. Jupiter, willing to clear the heavens of such troublesome company, called both parties before him, and inquired into their conduct. After a full hearing, he determined, that Folly should make some sort of reparation for the injury done to Love; and being resolved to punish both for the many irregularities which they had lately introduced, he condemned Love to wander about the earth, and ordered Folly to be his guide.

FABLE XXVI.

The Eclipse.

One day when the Moon was under an Eclipse, she complained thus to the Sun of the discontinuance of his favours. My dearest friend, said she, why do you not shine upon me as you used to do? Do I not shine upon thee? said the Sun; I am very sure that I intend it. O no, replies the Moon, but I now perceive the reason. I see that dirty planet, the Earth, is got between us.
The good influences of the great world would perhaps be more diffusive, were it not for their mischievous dependants, who are so frequently suffered to interpose.

FABLE XXVII.

The Boy and the Butterfly.

A Boy, greatly smitten with the colours of a Butterfly, pursued it from flower to flower with indefatigable pains. First he aimed to surprise it among the leaves of a rose; then to cover it with his hat, as it was feeding on a daisy; now hoped to secure it, as it rested on a sprig of myrtle; and now grew sure of his prize, perceiving it loiter on a bed of violets. But the fickle Fly, continually changing one blossom for another, still eluded his attempts. At length, observing it half buried in the cup of a tulip, he rushed forward, and snatching it with violence, crushed it all to pieces. The dying insect, seeing the poor Boy somewhat chagrined at his disappointment, addressed him with all the calmness of a stoic, in the following manner.—Behold, now the end of thy unprofitable solicitude! and learn, for the benefit of thy future life, that all pleasure is but a painted Butterfly: which, although it may serve to amuse thee in the pursuit, suit, if embraced with too much ardour, will perish in thy grasp.

FABLE XXVIII.

The Toad and Ephemerion.

As some workmen were digging marble in a mountain of Scythia, they discerned a Toad of an enormous size in the midst of a solid rock. They were very much surprized at so uncommon an appearance, and the more they considered the circumstances of it, the more their wonder increased. It was hard to conceive by what means this creature had preserved life and received nourishment in so narrow a prison; and still more difficult to account for his birth and existence in a place so totally inaccessible to all of his species. They could conclude no other, than that he was formed together with the rock in which he had been bred, and was coeval with the mountain itself. While they were pursuing these speculations, the Toad fate swelling and bloating, till he was ready to burst with pride and self-importance; to which at last he thus gave vent:—Yes, says he, you behold in me a specimen of the Antediluvian race of animals. I was begotten before the flood; and who is there among the present upstart race of mortals, that shall shall dare to contend with me in nobility of birth, or dignity of character? An Ephemerion, sprung that morning from the river Hypanis, as he was flying about from place to place, chanced to be present, and observed all that passed with great attention and curiosity. Vain boaster, says he, what foundation hast thou for pride, either in thy descent, merely because it is ancient, or thy life, because it hath been long? What good qualities hast thou received from thy ancestors? Insignificant even to thyself, as well as useless to others, thou art almost as insensible as the block in which thou waft bred. Even I, that had my birth only from the scum of the neighbouring river, at the rising of this day's sun, and who shall die at its setting, have more reason to applaud my condition, than thou hast to be proud of thine. I have enjoyed the warmth of the sun, the light of the day, and the purity of the air: I have flown from stream to stream, from tree to tree, and from the plain to the mountain: I have provided for posterity, and shall leave behind me a numerous offspring to people the next age of to-morrow: in short, I have fulfilled all the ends of my being, and I have been happy. My whole life, 'tis true, is but of twelve hours: but even one hour of it is to be preferred to a thousand years of mere existence: which have been spent, like thine; in sloth, ignorance, and stupidity.

FABLE XXIX.

The Peacock.

The Peacock, who at first was distinguished only by a crest of feathers, preferred a petition to Juno, that he might be honoured also with a train. As the bird was a particular favourite, Juno readily enough assented; and his train was ordered to surpass that of every fowl in the creation. The Minion, conscious of his superb appearance, thought it requisite to assume a proportionable dignity of gait and manners. The common poultry of the farm-yard were quite astonished at his magnificence; and even the pheasants themselves, beheld him with an eye of envy.—But when he attempted to fly, he perceived himself to have sacrificed all his activity to ostentation; and that he was encumbered by the pomp in which he placed his glory.
FABLE XXX.

The Fly in St. Paul's Cupola.

As a Fly was crawling leisurely up one of the columns of St. Paul's Cupola, she often stopped, surveyed, examined, and at last broke forth into the following exclamation. Strange! that any one who pretended to be an artist, should ever leave so superb a structure, with so many roughnesses unpolished! Ah, my friend! said a very learned architect, who hung in his web under one of the capitals, you should never decide of things beyond the extent of your capacity. This lofty building was not erected for such diminutive animals as you or I; but for a certain sort of creatures, who are at least ten thousand times as large: to their eyes, it is very possible, these columns may seem as smooth, as to you appear the wings of your favourite Mistress.

FABLE XXXI.

The Elm-tree and the Vine.

An extravagant young Vine, vainly ambitious of independency, and fond of rambling at large, despised the alliance of a stately Elm that grew near, and courted her embraces. Having risen risen to some small height without any kind of support, she shot forth her slimsy branches to a very uncommon and superfluous length; calling on her neighbour to take notice how little she wanted his assistance. Poor infatuated shrub, replied the Elm, how inconsistent is thy conduct! Would'st thou be truly independent, thou should'st carefully apply those juices to the enlargement of thy stem, which thou lavishest in vain upon unnecessary foliage. I shortly shall behold thee groveling on the ground; yet countenanced, indeed, by many of the human race, who, intoxicated with vanity, have despised economy; and who, to support for a moment their empty boast of independence, have exhausted the very source of it in frivolous expences.

FABLE XXXII.

The Laurustinus and the Rose-tree.

In the quarters of a shrubbery, where deciduous plants and ever-greens were intermingled with an air of negligence, it happened that a Rose grew not far from a Laurustinus. The Rose, enlivened by the breath of June, and attired in all its gorgeous blossoms, looked with much contempt on the Laurustinus; who had nothing to display but the dusky verdure of its leaves. What a wretched neighbourhood, cryed she, is this! and how unworthy to partake the honour of my company! Better to bloom and die in the desert, than to associate myself here with such low and dirty vegetables. And is this my lot at last, whom every nation has agreed to honour, and every Poet conspired to reverence, as the undisputed sovereign of the field and garden? If I really am so, let my subjects, at least, keep their distance, and let a circle remain vacant round me, suitable to the state my rank requires. Here, Gardiner, bring thy hatchet; prithee cut down this Laurustinus; or at least remove it to its proper sphere. Be pacified, my lovely Rose, replied the Gardiner; enjoy thy sovereignty with moderation, and thou shalt receive all the homage which thy beauty can require. But remember that in winter, when neither thou nor any of thy tribe produce one flower or leaf to cheer me, this faithful shrub, which thou despisest, will become the glory of my garden. Prudence therefore, as well as gratitude, is concerned, in the protection of a friend, that will shew his Friendship in adversity.
FABLE XXXIII.

The Sensitive Plant and the Palm-tree.

The Sensitive Plant being brought out of the greenhouse on a fine summer's day, and placed in a beautiful grove, adorned with the finest forest trees and the most curious plants, began to give himself great airs, and to treat all that were about him with much petulance and disdain. Lord! says she, how could the Gardiner think of setting me among a parcel of Trees; gross, inanimate things, mere vegetables, and perfect stocks! Sure he does not take me for a common plant, when he knows, that I have the sense of feeling in a more exquisite degree than he has himself. It really shocks me to see into what wretched low company he has introduced me: 'tis more than the delicacy of my constitution, and the extreme tenderness of my nerves, can bear. Pray, Mrs. Acacia, stand a little farther off, and don't perfume quite so much upon your idle pretence of being my cousin. Good Mr. Citron, keep your distance, I beseech you; your strong scent quite overpowers me. Friend Palm-tree, your offensive shade is really more than I am able to support. The lofty Palm-tree, tho' little moved by so unmannerly an attack, condescended condescended to rebuke the impertinent creature in the following manner. Thou vegetable fribble! Learn to know thyself, and thy own worthlessness and insignificance. Thou valuest thyself on a vicious softness, a false delicacy, the very defect and imbecility of thy nature. What art thou good for, that shrinkest at a touch, and droopest at a breath of air; feeble and barren, a perpetual torment to thyself, and wholly useless to others. Whereas we, whom thou treatest with such disdain, make a grateful return to man for his care of us: some of us yield him fruit; others are serviceable to him by their strength and firmness; we shade him from the heat of the sun, and we defend him from the violence of the winds. I am particularly distinguished for my hardiness and perseverance, my steadiness and constancy: and on account of those very qualities which thou wastest and affectest to despise, have the honour to be made the emblem of conquest, and the reward of the Conqueror.

FABLE XXXIV.

The Tentyrites and the Ichneuomon.

A Crocodile of prodigious size, and uncommon fierceness, infested the banks of the Nile, and spread desolation through all the neighbouring bouncing country. He seized the shepherd together with the sheep, and devoured the herdsman as well as the cattle. Emboldened by success, and the terror which prevailed wherever he appeared, he ventured to carry his incursions even into the island of Tentyra, and to brave the people, who boasted themselves the only tamers of his race. The Tentyrites themselves were struck with horror, at the appearance of a monster so much more terrible than they had ever seen before: even the boldest of them dared not to attack him openly; and the most experienced long endeavoured with all their art and address to surprise him, but in vain. As they were consulting together, what they should do in these circumstances, an Ichneumon stepped forth, and thus addressed them. I perceive your distress, neighbours: and tho' I cannot assist you in the present difficulty, yet give me leave to offer you some advice that may be of use to you for the future. A little prudence is worth all your art and your courage: it may be glorious to overcome a great evil, but the wisest way is to prevent it. You despise the Crocodile while he is small and weak; and do not sufficiently consider, that, as he is a long-lived animal, so 'tis his peculiar property to grow as long as he lives. You see I am a poor, little, feeble creature; yet am I much much more terrible to the Crocodile, and more useful to the country, than you are. I attack him in the egg; and while you are contriving for months together, how to get the better of one Crocodile, and all to no purpose, I effectually destroy fifty of them in a day.

FABLE XXXV.

The Tulip and the Rose.

A Tulip and a Rose happened to be near neighbours in the same garden. They were both indeed extremely beautiful; yet the Rose engaged considerably more than an equal share of the gardiner's attention. Enamoured, as in truth he was, of the delicious odour it diffused; he appeared, in the eye of the Tulip to be always kissing and caressing it. The envy and jealousy of rival beauties are not easily to be concealed. The Tulip, vain of its external charms, and unable to bear the thought of being forsaken for another, remonstrated in these words against the Gardiner's partiality. Why are my beauties thus neglected? Are not my colours more bright, more various, and more inviting, than any which that red-faced Thing has to display? Why then is she to engross your whole affection, and thus for ever to be preferred?—Be not dissatisfied, my my fair Tulip, said the Gardiner, I acknowledge thy beauties, and admire them as they deserve. But there are found in my favourite Rose such attractive odours, such internal charms, that I enjoy a banquet in their fragrance, which no mere beauty can pretend to furnish.

FABLE XXXVI.

The Woodcock and the Mallard.

A Woodcock and a Mallard were feeding together in some marshy ground at the tail of a mill-pond. Lard, says the squeamish Woodcock, in what a voracious and beastly manner do you devour all that comes before you! Neither snail, frog, toad, nor any kind of filth, can escape the fury of your enormous appetite. All alike goes down, without measure and without distinction.—What an odious vice is Gluttony!

Good-lack! Replied the Mallard, pray how came you to be my accuser? And whence has your excessive delicacy a right to censure my plain eating? Is it a crime to satisfy one's hunger? Or is it not indeed a Virtue rather, to be pleased with the food which nature offers us? Surely I would sooner be charged with gluttony, than with that finical and sickly appetite, on which you are pleased 25 Love and Solly.
26 The Eclipse.
27 The Boy and the Butterfly.
28 The Toad and the Ephemeran.
29 The Peacock.
30 The Fly in St. Paul's Cupola.
31 The Elm tree and the Vine.
32 The Laurus and the Rose tree.
33 The Centurion and Palm tree.
34 The Bent Root and Ichneumon.
35 The Tulip and the Rose.
36 The Woodcock and Mallard. pleased to ground your superiority of taste.—
What a silly vice is Daintiness.

Thus endeavouring to palliate their respective passions, our epicures parted with a mutual contempt. The Mallard hastening to devour some garbage, which was in reality a bait, immediately gorged an hook thro’ mere greediness and over-fight: while the Woodcock, flying thro’ a glade, in order to seek his favourite juices, was entangled in a net, spread across it for that purpose: falling each of them a sacrifice to their different, but equal, foibles.

FABLE XXXVII.

The two Trouts and the Gudgeon.

A Fisherman, in the month of May, stood angling on the banks of Thames, with an artificial fly. He threw his bait with so much art, that a young Trout was rushing towards it, when she was prevented by her mother. Never, said she, my child, be too precipitate, where there is a possibility of danger. Take due time to consider, before you risk an action that may be fatal. How know you whether your appearance be indeed a fly, or the snare of an enemy?—Let some one else make the experiment before you.
If it be a fly, he very probably will elude the first attack; and then the second may be made, if not with success, at least with safety.—She had no sooner uttered this caution, than a Gudgeon seized upon the pretended fly, and became an example to the giddy daughter, of the great importance of her mother’s counsel.

FABLE XXXVIII.

The Stars and the Sky-Rocket.

As a Rocket, on a rejoicing night, ascended thro’ the air, and observed the stream of light that distinguished his passage, he could not forbear exulting in his elevation, and calling upon the Stars to do him reverence. Behold, said he, what gazing multitudes admire the lustre of my train, whilst all your feeble sparks of light pass unobserved, or disregarded! The Stars heard his empty boast with a silent indignation: the Dog-Star only vouchsafed to answer him. How weak are they, said he, who value themselves on the voice of popular applause! ’Tis true, the novelty of thy appearance may procure to thee more admiration than is allotted to our daily course, although indeed a lasting miracle. But do not estimate thy importance by the capricious fancy of ill-judging mortals. Know thyself to be the the useless pageant, the frail production of a mortal hand. Even while I speak, thy blaze is extinguished, and thou art sunk into oblivion. We, on the other hand, were lighted up by heaven, for the advantage of mankind; and our glory shall endure for ever.

FABLE XXXIX.

The Farmer and his three Enemies.

A Wolf, a Fox, and a Hare, happened one evening to be foraging in different parts of a Farmer’s yard. Their first effort was pretty successful, and they returned in safety to their several quarters: however not so happy, as to be unperceived by the Farmer’s watchful eye; who, placing several kinds of snares, made each of them his prisoner in the next attempt. He first took the Hare to task, who confessed she had eaten a few turnip-tops, merely to satisfy her hunger: besought him piteously to spare her life, and promised never to enter his grounds again. He then accosted the Fox; who, in a fawning obsequious tone, protested, that he came into his premises, thro’ no other motive, than pure goodwill, to restrain the Hares and other vermin from the plunder of his corn; and that, whatever evil tongues might say, he had too great a regard, both both for him and for justice, to be in the least capable of any dishonest action. He last of all examined the Wolf, what business brought him within the purlieus of a Farmer's yard. The Wolf very impudently declared, it was with a view of destroying his lambs, to which he had an undoubted right: that the Farmer himself was the only felon, who robbed the community of Wolves of what was meant to be their proper food. That this, at least, was his opinion: and whatever fate attended him, he should not scruple to risk his life in the pursuit of his lawful prey.

The Farmer having heard their pleas, determined the cause in the following manner. The Hare, said he, deserves compassion, for the penitence he shews, and the humble confession he has made:—As for the Fox and Wolf, let them be hanged together; their crimes themselves alike deserve it, and are equally heightened by the aggravations of hypocrisy and of impudence.
FABLE XL.

The Snail and the Statue.

A Statue of the Medicean Venus was erected in a grove, sacred to beauty and the fine arts. Its modest attitude, its elegant proportions, assisted by the situation in which it was placed, attracted the regard of every delicate observer.—A Snail, who had fixed himself beneath the moulding of the pedestal, beheld with an evil eye the admiration it excited. Accordingly, watching his opportunity, he strove, by trailing his filthy slime over every limb and feature, to obliterate those beauties which he could not endure to hear so much applauded. An honest Linnet, however, who observed him at his dirty work, took the freedom to assure him, that he would infallibly lose his labour: For although, said he, to an injudicious eye, thou mayest fully the perfections of this finished piece, yet a more accurate and close inspecior, will discover its beauty, thro' all the blemishes with which thou hast endeavoured to disguise it.
FABLE XLI.

The Water-fall.

From the head of a narrow valley that is wholly overshadowed by the growth of trees, a large Cascade bursts forth with a luxuriance unexpected. First the current rushes down a precipice with headlong impetuosity; then dashed from rock to rock, and divided as it rolls along by fragments of stones or trunks of trees, it assumes a milk-white appearance, and sparkles thro' the gloom. All is intricacy; all is profusion: and the tide, however ample, appears yet more considerable by the fantastic growth of roots that hide the limits of its channel. Thus bounding down from one descent to another, it no sooner gains the level, than it sinks beneath the earth, and buries all its glory at our feet.

A spectator, privy to the scanty source which furnished out this grand appearance, stood one day in a musing posture, and began to moralize on its prodigality. Ah silly stream! said he, why wilt thou hasten to exhaust thy source, and thus wilfully incur the contempt that waits on poverty? Art thou ignorant that thy funds are by no means equal to this expence? Fear not, my kind adviser, advise, replied the generous Cascade; the gratitude I owe my master, who collected my rills into a stream, induces me to entertain his friends in the best manner I am able: when alone, I act with more oecconomy.

F A B L E  XLII.

The Oak and the Sycamore.

A Sycamore grew beside an Oak; and being not a little elevated by the first warm days in spring, began to shoot forth his leaves apace, and to despise the naked Oak for insensibility, and want of spirit. The Oak, conscious of its superior nature, made this philosophical reply. Be not, my friend, so much delighted with the first address of every fickle zephyr: consider the frosts may yet return: and if thou covetest an equal share with me in all the glories of the rising year, do not afford them an opportunity to nip thy beauties in their bud. As for myself, I only wait to see this genial warmth a little confirmed: and, whenever this is the case, I shall perhaps display a majesty that will not easily be shaken. But the tree that appears too suddenly affected by the first favourable glance of spring, will ever be the first to shed its verdure, and to drop beneath the frowns of winter.

FABLE
A Wolf ranging over the forest, came within the borders of a sheep-walk; when meeting with the Shepherd's Dog, that with a furly sort of growl, demanded his business there, he thought proper to put on as innocent an appearance as he could, and protested upon his honour, that he meant not the least offence. I am afraid, said the Dog, the pledge of your honour is but a poor depository for your honesty: you must not take it amiss, if I object to the Security. No slur upon my reputation, replied the Wolf, I beg of you. My sense of honour is as delicate, as my great achievements are renowned. I would not leave a stain upon my memory for the world. The fame of what are commonly called great achievements is very precious, to be sure, returned the Dog; almost equal to the character of an excellent butcher, a gallant highwayman, or an expert assassin. While the Dog was yet speaking, a lamb happened to stray within reach of our hero. The temptation was stronger than he was able to resist: He sprung upon his prey, and was scouring hastily away with it. However, the Dog seized and held him, till the arrival of the Shepherd, Shepherd, who took measures for his execution. Just as he was going to dispatch him; I observe, says the Dog, that one of your noble achievements, is the destruction of the innocent. You are welcome to the renown, as you are also to the reward of it. As for me, I shall prefer the credit of having honestly defended my master's property, to any fame you have acquired by thus heroically invading it.

FABLE XLIV.

_The Mushroom and the Acorn._

A N Acorn fell from the top of an old venerable Oak, full on the head of a Mushroom that unhappily sprung up beneath it. Wounded by the blow, the Mushroom complained of the incivility. Impertinent upstart, replied the Acorn, why didst thou, with familiar boldness, approach so near to thy superiors? Shall the wretched offspring of a dunghill presume to raise its head, on a spot ennobled by my ancestors for so many generations? I do not mean, returned the Mushroom, to dispute the honour of thy birth, or to put my own in competition with it. On the contrary, I must acknowledge that I hardly know from whence I sprung. But sure 'tis merit, and not mere ancestry, that obtains the regard of those, whose whose approbation is truly valuable: I have little perhaps to boast, but surely thou who hast thus insulted me, canst have no pretence to boast any. I please the palates of mankind, and give a poignant flavour to their most elegant entertainments; while thou, with all the pride of thy ancestry, art fit only to fatten Hogs.

Fable XLV.

Wisdom and Selfishness.

As Wisdom, in the form of a beautiful young lady, was travelling along the road, it happened on a time, that she was benighted and lost her way. She had not however wandered far, when perceiving a light glimmer from a window at some distance, she endeavoured to direct her steps towards the house where it appeared. This proved to be no other, than the miserable abode of Selfishness; who, beneath the semblance of a churlish and close-fisted peasant, had long taken up his residence in this lonesome habitation. She knocked at the door, to enquire her way. The Lout opened it with caution; but, being immediately struck with the uncommon lustre of so fine a figure, he found his appetite awake, and became impatient for the gratification of it. Wisdom, on the other hand, feeling an utter detestation for him, would have willingly withdrawn herself; but alas! it was too late. He was forced to present himself to the eyes of his former buffoon, unto whom she never could be induced to shew any marks of natural affection. She would not even own him for her proper offspring; and he was put into the hands of Dullness, to be nursed and educated at her discretion. As he arrived to years of maturity, he was known by the name of Cunning. Some faint resemblance which he bore of his mother, procured him a degree of respect among persons of small discernment; and he shewed somewhat of her address in regard to the means by which he gained his ends; but he had so much of the Father, as never to extend his aims to any truly noble or social achievement.

FABLE XLVI.

The Toad and the Gold-fish.

As a Gold-fish, newly brought from the warm regions of the east, displayed his beauties in the sun; a Toad, who had long eyed him with no small degree of envy, broke out into this exclamation. How partial and how fantastic is the favour of mankind! regardless of every every excellency that is obvious and familiar; and only struck with what is imported form a distant climate at a large expence! What a pompous basin is here constructed, and what extreme fondness is here shewn, for this insignificant stranger! While a quadrupede of my importance is neglected, shunned, and even persecuted. Surely were I to appear in China, I should receive the same, or perhaps greater honours, than are lavished here upon this tinsel favourite.

The Gold-fish, conscious of his real beauty, and somewhat angry to be thus insulted by so very unskilfully and deformed a creature, made this rational reply. It must be confessed, that the opinions of men, are sometimes guided by the caprice you mention. Yet, as for me and the rest of my tribe, it is well known that if we are admired in England, we are not less admired at home: being there esteemed by the greatest mandarins, fed by stated officers, and lodged in basons as superb as any your nation has to boast. Perhaps then, notwithstanding your sage remark, there are some virtues and some qualities that please or disgust almost universally; and as innocence joined to beauty seldom fails to procure esteem, so malice added to deformity will cause as general a detestation.

FABLE
FABLE XLVII.

The Hermit.

A certain Hermit had scooped his cave near the summit of a lofty mountain, from whence he had an opportunity of surveying a large extent both of sea and land. He sat one evening, contemplating with pleasure on the objects that lay diffused before him. The woods were drest in the brightest verdure; the thickets adorned with the gayest blossoms. The birds caroled beneath the branches; the lambs frolicked around the meads; the peafant whistled beside his team; and the ships driving by the gentle gales were returning safely into their proper harbours. In short, the arrival of spring had doubly enlivened the whole scene before his eye; and every object yielded a display either of beauty or of happiness.

On a sudden arose a violent storm. The winds mustered all their fury, and whole forests of oak lay scattered on the ground. Darkness instantly succeeded; hail-stones and rain were poured forth in cataracts, and lightning and thunder added horror to the gloom.
And now the sea piled up in mountains bore aloft the largest vessels; while the horrid uproar of its waves drowned the shrieks of the wretched mariners. When the whole tempest had exhausted its fury, it was instantly followed by the shock of an earthquake.

The poor inhabitants of the neighbouring villages flocked in crowds to our Hermit's cave; religiously hoping, that his well-known sanctity would be able to protect them in their distress. They were, however, not a little surprised at the profound tranquility that appeared in his countenance. "My friends, said he, be not dismayed. Terrible to me, as well as to you, would have been the war of elements we have just beheld; but that I have meditated with so much attention on the various works of Providence, as to be persuaded that his goodness is equal to his power".

F A B L E  X L V I I I.

The Dove.

A Dove that had a mate and young ones, happening to spy her cage door open, was driven by a sudden impulse to fly out into an adjacent grove. There, perched upon the bough of a cypress, she fete as it were wrapt in deep contemplation; temptation; not recovering from her reverie, until the owner drew nigh unseen, and brought her back to her little family.

Art thou not ashamed then, says her mate, thus to desert thy helpless offspring? Art thou not base to abandon me, for the company of birds to whom thou art a stranger? Could I have harboured such a thought? I, who have been ever constant to our first engagement; and must have died of mere despair, hadst thou not returned to my embraces? But how, alas, returned! Not, as it seems by choice; but ensnared by dint of artifice, and brought hither by constraint.

Have patience, replied the rambler, and hear the plea of thy repentant mate. Witness all ye powers of wedlock, ye that know what passes in the hearts of Doves, if ever, before this unhappy moment, I felt a wish to part from thee! The door so seldom open, allowed but one moment for deliberation, and I happened to decide amiss. When removed to yonder wood, the air of liberty breathed so very sweet, that, with horror I speak it, I felt a suspense about returning to the cage. Pardon, I pray thee, this one crime, and be well assured I will never repeat it. And that thou may'st be the more induced to pardon me, me, know that the love of liberty burns ever the strongest, in bosoms that are most open to conjugal affection and the love of young.

FABLE XLIX.

The Nightingale and Bullfinch.

A Nightingale and a Bullfinch occupied two cages in the same appartment. The Nightingale perpetually varied her song, and every effort she made, afforded fresh entertainment. The Bullfinch always whistled the same dull tune that he had learnt, 'till all the family grew weary of the disgustful repetition. What is the reason, said the Bullfinch one day to his neighbour, that your songs are always heard with peculiar attention, while mine, I observe, are almost as wholly disregarded? The reason, replied the Nightingale, is obvious; your audience are sufficiently acquainted with every note you have been taught, and they know your natural abilities too well, to expect any thing new from that quarter. How then can you suppose they will listen to a songster, from whom nothing native or original is to be expected?

FABLE
37. The Trout & the Gudgeon
38. The Star & the Sky-rocket
39. The Farmer & his Enemies
40. The Snail & the Statue
41. The Water-fall
42. The Oak & the Sycamore
43. The Wolf & the Shepherd's Dog
44. The Mushroom & the Acorn
45. Wisdom and Cunning
46. The Toad & the Gold-fish
47. The Hermit
48. The Dove
FABLE L.

The Fighting Cocks and the Turkey.

Two Cocks of the genuine game-breed, met by chance upon the confines of their respective walks. To such great and heroic souls, the smallest matter imaginable affords occasion for dispute. They approached each other with pride and indignation; they looked defiance; they crouched a challenge; and immediately commences a long and bloody battle. It was fought on both sides with so much courage and dexterity; they gave and they received such deep and desperate wounds; that they both lay down upon the turf utterly spent, blinded, and disabled. While this was their situation, a Turkey that had been a spectator of all that passed between them, drew near to the field of battle, and reproved them in this manner. "How foolish and absurd has been your quarrel, my good neighbours! A more ridiculous one could scarce have happened, amongst the most contentious of all creatures, men. Because you have crowed perhaps in each other's hearing, or one of you have picked up a grain of corn upon the territories of his rival, you have both rendered yourselves miserable for the remainder of your days."
FABLE XI.

The King-fisher and the Sparrow.

As a King-fisher was sitting beneath the shade, upon the banks of a river; she was surprized on a sudden by the fluttering of a Sparrow, that had eloped from the neighbouring town, to visit her. When the first compliments were over, "How is it possible, said the Sparrow, that a bird so finely adorned, can think of spending all her days in the very depth of retirement! The golden plumage of your breast, the shining azure of your pinions, were never given you to be concealed, but to attract the wonder of beholders. Why then should you not endeavour to know the world, and be, at the same time, yourself, both known and admired?" You are very complaisant at least, replied the King-fisher, to conclude that my being admired, would be the consequence of my being known. But it has sometimes been my lot, in the lonesome valleys that I frequent, to hear the complaints of beauty that has been neglected; and of worth that has been despised. Possibly it does not always happen, that even superior excellence is found to excite admiration, or obtain encouragement. I have learned besides, not to build my happiness upon the opinion nion of others, so much as upon my own self-conviction, and the approbation of my own heart. Remember, I am a King-fisher; these woods and streams are my delight; and so long as they are free from winds and tempests, believe me, I am perfectly content with my situation.
Why therefore should I court the noise and bus tle of the world, which I find so little agreeable to my native disposition? It may be the joy of a Sparrow to indulge his curiosity, and to display his eloquence. I, for my part, love silence, privacy, and contemplation; and think that everyone should consult the native bias of his temper, before he chooses the way of life in which he expects to meet with happiness.

Fable III.

The Bee and the Spider.

On the leaves and flowers of the same shrub, a Spider and a Bee pursued their several occupations; the one covering her thighs with honey; the other distending his bag with poison.
The Spider, as he glanced his eye obliquely at the Bee, was ruminating with spleen on the superiority of her production. And how happens it, said he, in a peevish tone, that I am able to collect nothing but poison from the self-same plant, plant, that supplies thee with honey? My pains and industry are not less than thine; in those respects, we are each indefatigable. It proceeds only, replied the Bee, from the different disposition of our nature: mine gives a pleasing flavour to every thing I touch; whereas thine converts it to poison, what by a different process had been the purest honey.
INDEX
TO THE FIRST BOOK.

FABLE I.
The Trees and the Bramble.

The most worthless persons are generally the most presuming.

FABLE II.
The Frogs desiring a King.

’Tis better to bear with some defects in a mild and gentle government, than to risque the greater evils of tyranny and persecution.

FABLE III.
The Wolf and the Shepherds.

We severely censure that in others, which we ourselves practise without scruple.

FABLE IV.
The Belly and the Members.

’Tis a folly even to wish to withhold our part from the support of civil government.
INDEX.

FABLE V.
The Fox and the Swallow.
We should well consider, whether the removal of a present evil does not tend to introduce a greater.

FABLE VI.
The Fox and the Raven.
Wherever flattery gains admission, it seems to banish common-sense.

FABLE VII.
The Fox and the Stork.
We should always reflect, before we rally another, whether we can bear the jest retorted.

FABLE VIII.
The Daw with borrowed Feathers.
To aim at figure by the means either of borrowed wit, or borrowed money, generally subjects us at least to tenfold ridicule.

FABLE IX.
The Wolf and the Lamb.
They who do not feel the sentiments of humanity, will seldom listen to the pleas of reason.

FABLE X.
The Mountain in Labour.
To raise uncommon expectations, renders an ordinary event ridiculous.
INDEX.

FABLE XI.
The Boys and the Frogs.
"Tis unjust and cruel to raise ourselves mirth, at the expense of another's peace and happiness.

FABLE XII.
The Lark and her Young-ones.
We should rely principally upon our own diligence, in matters that concern ourselves alone.

FABLE XIII.
The Stag drinking.
We often make a false estimate in preferring our ornamental talents to our useful ones.

FABLE XIV.
The Swallow and other Birds.
Some will listen to no conviction, but what they derive from fatal experience.

FABLE XV.
The As and the Lap-dog.
The attempt to recommend ourselves by a behaviour foreign to our character, is vain and ridiculous.

FABLE XVI.
The Lion and the Mouse.
We may all need the assistance of our inferiors; and should by no means consider the meanest among them as wholly incapable of returning an obligation.
INDEX.

FABLE XVII.
The Wolf and the Crane.
"Tis the utmost extent of some men's gratitude, barely to refrain from oppressing and injuring their bene factors.

FABLE XVIII.
The Country-man and the Snake.
To confer either power upon the mischievous, or favours on the undeserving, is a misapplication of our benevolence.

FABLE XIX.
The Dog and the Shadow.
An over-greedy disposition often subjects us to lose what we already possess.

FABLE XX.
The Sun and the Wind.
Gentle means, on many occasions, are more effectual than violent ones.

FABLE XXI.
The Wolf and the Mastiff.
A mere competence with liberty, is preferable to servitude amid the greatest affluence.

FABLE XXII.
Fortune and the School-boy.
We are always ready to censure fortune for the ill effects of our own carelessness.
INDEX.

FABLE XXIII.
The Frog and the Ox.
The silly ambition to vie with our superiors, in regard to outward figure, rather than inward accomplishment, is often the cause of utter ruin.

FABLE XXIV.
The Lion and other Beasts hunting.
An association with too powerful allies is always imprudent.

FABLE XXV.
The Ant and the Fly.
The independence acquired by industry is preferable to the most splendid state of vassalage.

FABLE XXVI.
The Bear and the two Friends.
Cowards are incapable of true friendship.

FABLE XXVII.
The Bull and the Gnat.
The least considerable of all mankind are seldom destitute of self-importance.

FABLE XXVIII.
The Wasp and the Bees.
'Tis a folly to arrogate works to ourselves of which we are by no means capable.
INDEX.

FABLE XXIX.
The Old Man and Death.
Men under calamity may seem to wish for death, but they seldom bid him welcome when he stares them in the face.

FABLE XXX.
The Court and the Country-Mouse.
Poverty with peace is preferable to the greatest affluence amidst anxiety.

FABLE XXXI.
The Fox and the Goat.
When we are going to encounter difficulties, we should depend more upon our own strength, than the assistance of our neighbours.

FABLE XXXII.
The Farmer, the Cranes, and the Stork.
They who keep bad company must often expect to suffer for the misbehaviour of their companions.

FABLE XXXIII.
The Oak and the Willow.
The courage of meeting death in an honourable cause, is more commendable, than any address or artifice we can make use of to evade it.

FABLE XXXIV.
The Boy and the Filberts.
The surest way to gain our ends is to moderate our desires.
INDEX.

FABLE XXXV.
The Satyr and the Traveller.

We should immediately decline all commerce with a person whom we find to be a double-dealer.

FABLE XXXVI.
The Horse and the Stag.

Let revenge be ever so sweet, 'tis too dear a purchase at the price of liberty.

FABLE XXXVII.
The Farmer and his Sons.

Industry is itself a treasure.

FABLE XXXVIII.
The Lion and the Gnat.

Little minds are so much elevated by any advantage gained over their superiors, that they are often thrown off their guard against a sudden change of fortune.

FABLE XXXIX.
The Miser and his Treasure.

'Tis the enjoyment of what we possess that alone gives it any real value.

FABLE XL.
Minerva's Olive.

Whatever fancy may determine, the standing value of all things is in proportion to their use.
INDEX.

FABLE XLII.
The Mimick and the Countryman.
There is no error too extravagant for prepossession and partiality.

FABLE XLIII.
The Dog and the Crocodile.
'Tis ever dangerous to be long conversant with persons of a bad character.

FABLE XLIII.
The Wolf in disguise.
There would be little chance of detecting hypocrisy, were it not always addicted to over-act its part.

FABLE XLIV.
The Bee and the Spider.
Neither ingenuity nor learning are intitled to regard, but in proportion as they contribute to the happiness of life.

FABLE XLV.
The Afs and his Master.
Avarice often misses its point, thro' the means it uses to secure it.

FABLE XLVI.
The Cock and the Fox.
To retort the artifice employed against us is an allowable part of self-defence.
INDEX.

FABLE XLVII.
The Eagle and the Crow.
A false estimate of our own abilities ever exposes us to ridicule, and sometimes to danger.

FABLE XLVIII.
The Farmer and the Stag.
Some expect the thanks that are due to a civility, while they endeavour clandestinely to undermine the value of it.

FABLE XLIX.
The Lion, the Tyger, and the Fox.
The intemperate rage of clients gives the lawyer an opportunity of seizing the property in dispute.

FABLE L.
The Lion and the Afs.
A total neglect is the best return the generous can make to the scurrility of the base.

FABLE LI.
The Snake and the Hedge-hog.
'Tis very imprudent to join interests with those who are able to impose upon us their own conditions.

FABLE LII.
The Trumpeter.
The fomenter of mischief is at least as culpable as he who puts it in execution.
INDEX.

FABLE LIII.
Vice and Fortune.
Fortune, without the concurrence of vice, cannot effectually destroy our happiness: whereas vice, without the help of fortune, can make us miserable to the last extremity.

FABLE LIV.
The Bear and the Bees.
'Twere more prudent to acquiesce under an injury from a single person, than by an act of vengeance to bring upon us the resentment of the whole community.

INDEX TO THE SECOND BOOK.

FABLE I.
The Miller, his Son, and their Afs.
'Tis better to pursue the dictates of one's own reason, than attempt to please all mankind.

FABLE II.
The Sorcerers.
There are numbers of people who would unhinge the world, to ease themselves of the smallest inconvenience.
INDEX.

FABLE III.
The Cameleon.
The different lights, in which things appear to different judgments, recommend candor to the opinions of others, even at the time that we retain our own.

FABLE IV.
The Wolf and the Lamb.
The young and artless should make caution supply the place of years and experience.

FABLE V.
The Fox and the Bramble.
We should bear with patience a small evil, when it is connected with a greater good.

FABLE VI.
The Falcon and the Hen.
Different kinds of experience account for different kinds of conduct.

FABLE VII.
The Travellers and the Money-bag.
We cannot reasonably expect those to bear a part in our ill-fortune, whom we never permitted to share in our prosperity.

FABLE VIII.
The discontented Afs.
We greatly diminish the happiness of life, by undervaluing all that is short of perfection.
INDEX.

FABLE IX.
The two Springs
There is more to be expected from sedate and silent, than from noisy, turbulent, and ostentatious beginnings.

FABLE X.
The Butterfly and the Rose.
We exclaim loudly against that inconstancy in another, to which we give occasion by our own.

FABLE XI.
The Tortoise and the two Ducks.
Curiosity often excites those people to hazardous undertakings, whom vanity and indiscretion render totally unfit for them.

FABLE XII.
The Cat and the old Rat.
Repeated instances of artifice create a suspicion, that is our guard against it.

FABLE XIII.
The Country Maid and her Milk-pail.
When we dwell much on distant and chimerical advantages; we neglect our present business, and are exposed to real misfortunes.

FABLE XIV.
The Cormorant and the Fishes.
'Tis extreme folly to ask advice of an interested adviser.
INDEX.

FABLE XV.
The Atheist and the Acorn.
He who disputes the existence of a deity, will find himself confuted by every part of nature.

FABLE XVI.
The Lynx and the Mole.
We should use the talents that are allotted, and are most suitable to our species; instead of disparaging those faculties, that are as properly adapted to another.

FABLE XVII.
The Spider and the Silk-worm.
He that is employed in works of use, generally advantages himself or others; while he, who toils alone for fame must often expect to lose his labour.

FABLE XVIII.
The Bee and the Fly.
The greatest genius with a vindictive temper, is far surpased in point of happiness by men of talents less considerable.

FABLE XIX.
Genius, Virtue, and Reputation.
There are few things so irreparably lost, as reputation.

FABLE XX.
The Court of Death.
Intemperance is the great and original cause, that generally shortens human life.

O 4
INDEX.

FABLE XXI.
Industry and Sloth.
Our term of life does not allow time for long-protracted deliberations.

FABLE XXII.
The Hare’s Ears.
A prudent person will not only preserve his innocence, but avoid the consequence of any seeming handle he may afford to his oppressor.

FABLE XXIII.
The Hermit and the Bear.
The random zeal of inconsiderate friends, is often as hurtful as the wrath of enemies.

FABLE XXIV.
The Passenger and the Pilot.
We are no where out of the reach of providence, either to punish or to protect us.

FABLE XXV.
The partial Judge.
The injuries we do, and those we suffer, are seldom weighed in the same scales.

FABLE XXVI.
The Fox that had lost his Tail.
’Tis common for men to wish others reduced to their own level; and we ought to guard against such advice, as may proceed from this principle.
INDEX.

FABLE XXVII.
The Nobleman and his Son.
The means suggested by superstition to secure us from misfortune, often bring it upon our heads.

FABLE XXVIII.
Jupiter and the Herdsman.
Were our ill-judged prayers to be always granted, how many would be ruined at their own request!

FABLE XXIX.
The Eagle and the Owl.
The partiality of parents often makes themselves ridiculous, and their children unhappy.

FABLE XXX.
The Plague among the Beasts.
The poor and helpless undergo those punishments for small and trivial offences; which the rich and powerful escape, for crimes of a much blacker nature.

FABLE XXXI.
The Cat, the Cock, and the young Mouse.
It is not safe to trust to outward appearances.

FABLE XXXII.
The Farmer and his Dog.
The greater room there appears for resentment; the more careful should we be, not to accuse an innocent person.
INDEX.

FABLE XXXIII.
The Gnat and the Bee.

Men expostulate to little purpose, when their own example confutes their argument.

FABLE XXXIV.
The Owl and the Eagle.

Narrow minds think the system of the universe should have been contrived to suit themselves alone.

FABLE XXXV.
The Lion, the Wolf, and the Fox.

Men, who meditate mischief, suggest the same to others; and generally pay dear for their froward gratifications.

FABLE XXXVI.
The Blind Man and the Lame.

The wants and weaknesses of individuals form the connections of society.

FABLE XXXVII.
The Lion, the Bear, the Monkey, and the Fox.

It is often more prudent to suppress our sentiments, than either to flatter or to rail.

FABLE XXXVIII.
The Owl and the Nightingale.

'Tis natural for a pedant to despise those arts, which polish our manners, and would extirpate pedantry.
INDEX.

FABLE XXXIX.
The Ant and the Caterpillar.

Boys of no very promising appearance often become the greatest men.

FABLE XL.
The two Foxes.

We should ever guard against those vices, that are chiefly incident to our times of life: excess and riot, whilst we are young; and egregious parsimony, as we grow in years.

FABLE XLI.
The conceited Owl.

Schemes of ambition, without proper talents, always terminate in disgrace.

FABLE XLII.
The Fox and the Cat

Persons may write fine systems of morality, who never practised a single virtue.

FABLE XLIII.
The two Horses.

The object of our pride is often the cause of our misfortunes.

FABLE XLIV.
The Dove and the Ant.

The most important actions are often performed by the most unlikely instruments.
INDEX

FABLE XLV.
The Parrot.
Gravity, tho' sometimes the mien of wisdom, is often found to be the mask of ignorance.

FABLE XLVI.
The Cat and the Bat.
It is easy to find reasons to justify any thing we are inclined to do.

FABLE XLVII.
The two Lizards.
The superior safety of an obscure and humble station is a ballance for the honours of high and envied life.

FABLE XLVIII.
Jupiter's Lottery.
Folly, passing with men for wisdom, makes each contented with his own share of understanding.

FABLE XLIX.
The Litigious Cats.
The scales of Judicature are seldom poised, 'till there is little or nothing remains in either.

FABLE L.
The two Dogs.
Our own moderation will not secure us from disturbance, if we connect ourselves with men of turbulent and litigious dispositions.
INDEX.

FABLE LI.
Death and Cupid.
The young should not act, as tho’ they were exempt from Death: nor the old forget to guard against the frolics of Love.

FABLE LIII.
The Mock-bird.
Ridicule appears with a very ill grace, in persons who possess no one talent beside.

FABLE LIII.
The Spectacles.
Our opinions of things are altogether as various, as if each saw them thro’ a different medium; our attachment to these opinions are as fixed and firm, as if all saw them thro’ the medium of truth.
INDEX
TO THE THIRD BOOK.

FABLE I.
IMITATION may be pardonable, where emulation would be presumptuous.

FABLE II.
The two Bees.
Moderation and intemperance reward and punish themselves.

FABLE III.
The Diamond and the Glow-worm.
A strong point of light is as favourable to merit, as it is destructive to imposture.

FABLE IV.
The Ostrich and the Pelican.
The pleasures of parental fondness make large amends for its anxieties.

FABLE V.
The Hounds in Couples.
Mutual compliances are necessary to matrimonial happiness.
INDEX.

FABLE VI.
The Miser and the Magpye.
Men are seldom found to condemn themselves; otherwise than by the censure they pass upon their own faults in other people.

FABLE VII.
The Sensitive Plant and the Thistle.
Both a mild disposition, and a vindictive temper, generally meet with suitable returns.

FABLE VIII.
The Poet and the Death-watch.
The suggestions of vanity are as delusive as those of superstition.

FABLE IX.
Pythagoras and the Critic.
To estimate the works of others by the sole standard of our own conceptions is always presumptuous, and often ridiculous.

FABLE X.
The Bear.
Religious opinions are by no means the proper objects of ridicule.

FABLE XI.
The Stork and the Crow.
We should never place the essence of religion in the mere observance of rites and ceremonies.
INDEX.

FABLE XII.

Echo and the Owl.

The vain believe their imaginary perfections engross the attention of all mankind.

FABLE XIII.

Prometheus.

The blessing of hope is better adapted to the state of mortals, than the gift of prescience.

FABLE XIV.

Momus.

It is hardly possible to deprive malevolence of every occasion for a cavil.

FABLE XV.

The Butterfly, the Snail, and the Bee.

Fops may boast of their extensive travels, but 'tis only a few discerning persons that make a proper use of them.

FABLE XVI.

The Tuberose and the Sun-flower.

To rest in second causes without reference to the first, is both impious and absurd.

FABLE XVII.

The Magpye and the Raven.

The fop who prides himself upon a large acquaintance is but seldom capable of real friendship.
INDEX.

FABLE XVIII.
The Diamond and the Load-stone.
The greatest merit is often concealed under the most unpromising appearances.

FABLE XIX.
The Boy and the Nettle.
There are certain persons who require to be treated rather with spirit and resolution, than either tenderness or delicacy.

FABLE XX.
The Monster in the Sun.
The fault we many times impute to a character, is only to be found in the mind of the observer.

FABLE XXI.
The discontented Bee.
The pleasures of life would be a balance for the pains; did we not increase the latter by our own perverseness.

FABLE XXII.
The Snipe Shooter.
We often miss our point by dividing our attention.

FABLE XXIII.
The Beggar and his Dog.
'Tis misery to depend upon patrons, whose circumstances make their charity necessary at home.
INDEX.

FABLE XXIV.
The Sun and the Vapour.

Truth, tho' vanished, returns again; slander is never of a durable nature.

FABLE XXV.
Love and Folly.

Folly has often too great an influence in the direction of our amours.

FABLE XXVI.
The Eclipse.

The favours of the great are too often obstructed by the invidious offices of their mean dependents.

FABLE XXVII.
The Boy and the Butterfly.

An immoderate pursuit of pleasures is generally destructive of its object.

FABLE XXVIII.
The Toad and the Ephemerons.

A lazy reliance on the antiquity of a family, is by far less honourable than an honest industry.

FABLE XXIX.
The Peacock.

The parade and ceremony belonging to the great, are often a restraint upon their freedom and activity.
INDEX.

FABLE XXX.
The Fly in St. Paul’s Cupola.
We should never estimate things beyond our reach, by the narrow standard of our own capacities.

FABLE XXXI.
The Elm-tree and the Vine.
People who pride themselves upon their independence, often slight economy, the sole foundation of it.

FABLE XXXII.
The Laurustinus and the Rose.
That friend is highly to be respected at all times, whose friendship is chiefly distinguished in adversity.

FABLE XXXIII.
The Sensitive Plant and the Palm-tree.
An excess of delicacy is to be considered rather as an infirmitiy, than as a virtue.

FABLE XXXIV.
The Tentyrites and the Ichneumon.
We conquer many evils at first with facility, which being long neglected become unsurmountable.

FABLE XXXV.
The Tulip and the Rose.
Extreme beauty will often captivate; but ’tis internal merit that secures the conquest.
INDEX.

FABLE XXXVI.
The Woodcock and the Mallard.

A voracious appetite, and a fondness for dainties, equally take off our attention from more material concerns.

FABLE XXXVII.
The two Trouts and the Gudgeon.

A person can hardly be deemed too cautious, where the first mistake is irretrievable, or fatal.

FABLE XXXVIII.
The Stars and the Sky-Rocket.
Pretenders to merit are always more vain than those who really possess it.

FABLE XXXIX.
The Farmer and his three Enemies.
Humility extenuates any crime, of which hypocrisy and impudence are equal aggravations.

FABLE XL.
The Snail and the Statue.
'Tis the fate of envy to attack those characters, that are superior to its malice.

FABLE XLI.
The Water-fall.
A generous nature will find resources in economy, for the occasional exertion of beneficence and hospitality.
INDEX.

FABLE XLII.
The Oak and the Sycamore.
He who is puffed up with the least gale of prosperity, will as suddenly sink beneath the blasts of misfortune.

FABLE XLIII.
The Wolf and the Shepherd’s Dog.
Common honesty is a better principle, than what we often compliment with the name of heroism.

FABLE XLIV.
The Mushroom and the Acorn.
The man who values himself too highly upon his birth, has seldom much claim to any other merit.

FABLE XLV.
Wisdom and Selfishness.
Cunning seems to differ from wisdom, more in the end that it proposes to itself, than in the means that it employs.

FABLE XLVI.
The Toad and the Gold-fish.
Beauty joined with innocence is universally respected; malice added to deformity, as universally abhorred.

FABLE XLVII.
The Hermit.
The goodness of Providence apparent in his works, is a proper motive for our tranquility amidst every exertion of his power.
INDEX.

FABLE XLVIII.
The Dove.

The love of liberty, in well constituted minds, holds a place little inferior to that of natural affection.

FABLE XLIX.
The Nightingale and Bullfinch.

Learning is undoubtedly of the utmost advantage to real genius: yet, when put in competition, the funds of the one are limited; and of the other inexhaustible.

FABLE L.
The Fighting Cocks and the Turkey.

Litigious persons seldom consider before they go to law, whether the conquest will be worth the cost.

FABLE LI.
The King-fisher and the Sparrow.

Men's natural tempers will best direct them to their proper sphere, in the pursuit of happiness.

FABLE LII.
The Spider and the Bee.

The candid reader will reap improvement, where the forward critic finds only matter of censure.

FINIS.
5/60
01-1-2-88, B-08, P4
Frankis & 15 plates
Gaskell, 27
2nd Baskerville ed-some ff torn Bddly foxed & stained Apparently the uncannoted a 8; not seen by Gaskell